NOTES OF THE WEEK.

M. Venizelos and Greece.

There cannot be the least doubt that M. Venizelos has done the right thing in returning to Greece. The deadlock in the country was complete; statesmanship was bankrupt. During the fifteen months of its tenure of power the Revolutionary Committee had reduced the Greek nation to political impotence; it had no remedies of its own for the impossible state of affairs that it had brought about, and it could not see clearly enough ahead to support with conviction any of the palliatives suggested. In the end it has agreed to the calling in of M. Venizelos to clear up the mess for which it is itself responsible, and if its decision to efface itself permanently is genuinely carried out, nothing will have become the Committee so well as its disappearance. M. Venizelos, it is obvious, has no easy task before him, but we are inclined to regard it as less insuperable than his persistent refusal to return would suggest. It is true that feeling against him could hardly have been more bitter or more vindictive; but it was so because he chose to pit himself against the nation's popular hero in such a way that there had to be a vote of ostracism for one or the other. There are many Greeks who will never forgive M. Venizelos. Few of them, it is to be hoped, however, will carry the vendetta so far as to prefer to see Greece continue in her agony rather than recover health at the hands of the man they hate.

The Way of Health.

A wise physician, in diagnosing an illness, will not overlook its earliest symptoms. For seven years the body politic of Greece has suffered from complete paralysis, first on one side, then on the other. To know what it was capable of accomplishing when it functioned in its entirety we have to go back to the time when the kingdom was ruled by a Sovereign whose popularity was unchallenged. It matters little to-day how or from whom the challenge first came; the fact remains that with it began the patient's sickness, the paralysis which still endures. Venizelism may have been right, King Constantine quite wrong. M. Venizelos himself, however, has publicly admitted that Venizelism has not been capable of inspiring unity in Greece. It would seem, therefore, a sound course to adopt to revert to the system under which the country did know peace of mind. If M. Venizelos were boldly to declare himself on the side of the dynasty, recall the King, and then set to work to lead the Greeks back to constitutionalism, he would have no occasion to complain of the personal hostility of his fellow-countrymen. They have suffered too much during the last eighteen months to reject the opportunity thus offered for a return to normal conditions. The remedy proposed by the Republicans, on the other hand, is essentially a leap in the dark, and offers little change from the régime associated with the name of the Revolutionary Committee. Confidence is more likely to be engendered by the return to a system which has been proved in the past.

A Rest from Politics.

It is to be hoped that M. Venizelos's task will not be impeded by the great expectations built upon his return. He can, after all, work only through the people themselves; he comes to heal the nation's wounds, but the only remedy is a change of heart. He can point this out and can show how the cure is to be effected; the remedy itself can be prepared by the Greeks alone, above all, by those forming the several political groups. M. Venizelos stresses the temporary and almost unofficial character of his return; he will not form a Cabinet, although he may not be averse from holding some office which is compatible with neutrality in regard to party politics. Venizelos with no lot or part in Venizelism is an anomaly which would seem to bear little relation to the critical nature of Greece's illness. More heroic measures, we imagine, will be required, and it would be better to have M. Venizelos take charge of Venizelism, and, in view of the fact that he can see farther than most of his countrymen, compel it to adopt the change of heart that must necessarily precede the rehabilitation of Greece. He is, perhaps, well advised to refuse the Prime Ministership. He has too many followers waiting to be rewarded by official posts to be allowed to form a Coalition Cabinet, and a purely Venizelist Government, even if it aroused no misgivings, could hardly preach a change of heart to the rest of Greece. When he has recalled the King no one will challenge his right to be the power behind the Throne, exercising his influence through the Government of the day, provided that he has been the means of eliminating the Revolutionary Committee, reducing the Republicans to the unimportance that their numbers merit, and keeping his own followers in order. It is not so much a change of politics as a rest from politics that Greece needs; with the latter will come the opportunity for the people to get on with their work, while the Government gives its attention to honest, impartial, and efficient administration.

The Turkish Treason Trials.

The Tribunal of Independence sent from Angora to dragoon Constantinople into subservience has justified its existence by sentencing the leader of the Turkish Bar to five years' penal servitude. His offence was criticism of the Angora régime, and, as that particular crime is provided for in recent enactments, the tribunal had an easier task than in the case of the three editors who made a first attempt at "Stop Press News" in their papers. In view of the fact that the last journalist who displeased Angora was simply murdered, the judicial proceedings against the three newspaper men must be regarded as a step towards better methods. The aspect of the proceedings that will strike foreigners most of all is the palpable anxiety of Mustapha Kemal Pasha's Government for the existence of the republic. A system which must not be exposed to the least breath of criticism can hardly be regarded as resting on a very sure foundation; it is certainly not broad-based upon the people's will. In the interests of peace and progress in Turkey we could wish that such a strong man as Mustapha Kemal Pasha had identified himself with a more robust régime, which could have afforded to ignore the outspokenness of many Lufti Fikris and to encourage Turkish journals to be as up to date as possible. As things are, there will be a tendency not to take seriously such a delicate organisation, which has to be bolstered up with arbitrary tribunals devoid of a sense of humour.

Yugoslavia and Bulgaria.

Reports from Belgrade are inclined to attach no little importance to a speech delivered in the Sobranye by the Bulgarian Prime Minister, M. Zankoff. Three weeks ago M. Nintchitch, Foreign Minister of Yugoslavia, in a review of foreign affairs pointed out that Yugoslavia would not believe in the sincerity of the Bulgarian Government or in the possibility of friendly relations as long as komitaji bands entered Serbian territory from Bulgaria. King Boris's Speech from the Throne, delivered a few days previously, had spoken hopefully of Yugoslav-Bulgarian relations, and M. Nintchitch's remarks must have administered a cold douche to Sofia. Accordingly at the earliest opportunity M. Zankoff appears to have returned the Bulgarian Roland for the Yugoslav Oliver. Relations between the two countries, he is reported to have said, could not be friendly owing to the question of Macedonia. There is considerable truth in this statement, which in effect merely paraphrases M. Nintchitch's remarks. Public opinion in Belgrade, which is served by a very excitable Press, has, however, taken umbrage at M. Zankoff's speech, and is attempting again to raise the bogey of Bulgaria as a menace to Europe. Even when every allowance is made for the fact that the two countries are neighbours, the Yugoslavs must not be surprised if Europe does not share their pathetic alarm, which accords so ill with Serbian prowess in the War. Even if Bulgarian sincerity is doubted—so far there has been no justification for doubting it—it is very obvious that not even the Serbs need lose their sleep at nights on account of Bulgaria until Europe is divided into two equal camps, and a Bulgarian army of a few score thousand men is able to turn the scale in favour of one or the other. Meanwhile a golden rule for the Balkans these days is to avoid provocation.

The Transjordanian Meeting.

The visit of King Hussein of the Hejaz to his son, the Emir Abdullah of Transjordania, inevitably excites speculation as to its bearing on the general Arab question. The High Commissioner of Palestine will take advantage of the visit, as he did of the presence earlier in the year of King Faisal at Amman, to confer with the Emir Abdullah and his guest, and it would be strange if no reference were made to the position in Palestine. There can be little doubt that King Hussein's sympathies will be with the idea of Palestine as an exclusively Arab State; but inasmuch as this idea does not for the time being come within the sphere of practical politics, any useful contribution on the King's part to the problem could only take the form of counselling the Arabs to co-operate whole-heartedly with the British Government until the time is riper for their scheme. It is problematical, however, whether King Hussein's influence in Palestine is sufficient to warrant such a step on his part. On the other hand, any movement towards the establishment of peaceful relations among the Arab peoples and tribes of the Middle East is to be welcomed. A conference is about to be held at Koweit, at which Irak, Transjordania, and the Sultan of Nejd, as well as various Arab tribes, will be represented, and it would be well if the Hejaz could be brought into any settlement that made for the maintenance of peace in the Arabian peninsula.

India in 1924.

The opening of a New Year finds India prosperous but perplexed, and there is some comfort in the thought that profitable business is less dependent on political uncertainty than in many other countries. Lord Willingdon, speaking at the St. Andrew's dinner at Madras, diagnosed the political situation as a case of indigestion, and the metaphor, while it was appropriate to the occasion on which it was uttered, brings us very near the truth. The new political diet has as yet been imperfectly assimilated, but India, which needs a short period of abstinence and steady exercise, is at the moment inclined rather to ask for more, and richer, cakes, and to regard the advice of the most learned practitioners as an insult to the national self-respect. For such an attitude experience is the only remedy, effective in the long run, though undoubtedly unpleasant in its operation, and most of the new legislatures have a anxious time before them, the outcome of which appears to depend mainly on the willingness of their members to subordinate fancies to facts, and on the discovery of a greater capacity for leadership than has yet made itself manifest.

The Need for Organisation.

The chief lesson of the elections has been the elementary one, on which we have so often insisted, that organisation in the constituencies is as necessary in India as elsewhere. The groups which talked glibly but did not take their coats off have suffered serious losses, while those which gave time and brains to the work have secured a larger representation than impartial observers expected. It is true that, in order to do so, some of them have drawn rather heavy bills on the credulity of the electors, and both parties to the transaction are likely to have an unpleasant time when the day for settlement arrives, but this is almost inevitable in the circumstances, and, as time goes on, the electors will learn to scrutinise such paper more carefully. The organisers on their side have still to learn that acceptance of the coupon of a group does not suffice to make a satisfactory member. Fissiparous tendencies are already at work in some of the larger groups, and the experience of at least one session is necessary before any opinion can be formed of their actual voting strength in conditions where votes may make a real difference.

The Extremist Position.

The lack of real homogeneity is most apparent within the large group of the extremists. The members are, of course, pledged to wreck something, but comparison of their pledges leaves it doubtful what exactly they are pledged to wreck, while the degree of determination seems to vary with the individual. As a whole, too, the group is affected by the acute differences between Hindus and Moslems. Mr. Mahomed Ali's declaration that he is Moslem first and Indian next undoubtedly represents the real attitude of many Moslems who have not the same capacity for blurting out the truth, but it is an attitude which drives many Hindus frantic, and it is not easy to see how men who differ so widely can continue to work together for objects in regard to which the relations of the two communities are vitally important. The extremists are worrying out their difficulties at Coconada as we write, and it is still uncertain whether they will succeed in their immediate purpose of finding a formula; but in practical work a formula is apt to wear thin very rapidly, and for this group, as for most of the others, what has still to be found is a unifying principle, realised with sufficient force to ensure the subordination of the feelings and prejudices of individuals.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

The New Year.

Once more the task is before us of shaping the course of a New Year. And we turn to it, because we more than ever must, with fresh determination. There is, indeed, little enough ground, speaking in general terms, for the optimism which marked the beginning of 1923, for in that year, far more than we had thought possible, events shaped us. In 1924 a more resolute attempt must be made to overtake and overhaul circumstances; else there is no telling whither we may drift. Perhaps we shall all start on the basis of individual optimism, and then extend it to national and world affairs. It is certain, at any rate, that no call, except in the name of humanity, can be made with any chance of success to reconcile the opposing tendencies of Europe—appeals to such things as religion or race fall flat and dead.

Church Reunion.

As if to mark the impotence of the time (but also as a godsend to the journalists, who were racking their sterile brains on what to write about during the barren Christmas season), the Archbishop of Canterbury a few days ago issued a letter in which he exposes the prospect of reunion between the various Christian Churches. His letter has raised no end of superficial froth, but, I think, little real beer has been uncorked, for people are not vitally interested in the matter.

It is, to an outside observer, a most amazing thing, this content with their own communions and the reluctance of scores of churches to reunite. Quite obviously, in their zeal to save the world, they are much more convinced that their "competitors" (as, in fact, they are) are wrong than that they themselves are right. One could hardly have expected, in this age of toleration, all the nasty things that have been said by the various sects about the others.

I do not speak here of Anglican and, generally, Protestant re-union with Rome, for British suspicion of Rome is still deep. Reunion with Rome will come about only when the lesser Church goes to the greater.

But the most remarkable point in the discussions which have been raised—discussions which, incidentally, have given a chance to many officials of ecclesiastical bodies to justify, and, indeed, to demonstrate, their existence—is the manner in which one sect gives another sect advice. Thus we have a Nonconformist proclaiming that reunion with Rome would split the Church of England, we have the old jealousy by Wesleyans of Congregationalists and Baptists revived, we have the fatiguing expression of fear on the part of the Evangelicals towards the High Church. A visitor from Mars would certainly find more difficulty in describing a Christian than a Moslem!

Rome and the Eastern Church.

There is something at once quite incomprehensible and quite real about the average Englishman's attitude towards the Catholic Church. He knows as well as most people the services that the Catholic Church of Rome has rendered to the world, particularly to Europe; he knows that his own Church, to which he is supposed to belong, is but a few hundred years old: and he is no longer deceived by the old official statements that this country rejected Roman claims at the time of the Reformation, for—as you may hear anywhere in intelligent conversation upon the topic—he is now possessed of sufficient history to understand that the policy of the Tudors was political and not religious. Yet, in spite of all this, he will not have Rome at any price; he will, rather, stick to his local Church of England, or even to a Nonconformist sect.

Sometimes, as one gathers from recent talks and readings upon the Archbishop's letter, this opposition to Rome is controlled, sometimes impetuous. It comes now, not as perhaps it once came, from a fervent difference in doctrine or in dogma, or from the traditional belief that once in Rome liberty of thought is impossible to the individual, but, rather, from a profound distrust of all forms of organised religion. Since Rome is the best organised, it is, therefore, the most feared. It is true that there was scarcely a reader of the Evening Standard who did not think that Dean Inge's recent arguments in that opportunist organ against the Catholic Church were not shattered to bits by Mr. Hilaire Belloc, but for all that they are still on the side of the gloomy Dean. Reunion with Rome is for this generation, at any rate, manifestly an unprofitable topic.

And what of the Eastern Churches? Most English Christians who do not know these churches intimately seem to suspect a certain artificiality in the desire to unite with them. Not that they think it is now no more than the filioque clause which divides the Eastern and Western Churches, but they do severely disapprove of the political uses to which Orthodox ecclesiastics appear sometimes to bend their offices. The recognition by certain of the more "political" Patriarchates of the validity of Anglican Orders may flutter a few dovecotes, but upon the mass of English Christians it makes no visible impression.

It would seem, in short, that the Churches of England are not convinced of the desirability of the unity of the Christian Church—in other words, they believe that the term "Christendom" is, and should be, a myth. In yet other words, they incline to think that salvation must be partial or local.

The civilisation that comes after ours will be able to judge whether they were right or wrong.

The Countryside and Motor Spirit.

It is delightful to learn that at last the Shell-Mex people and the Anglo-American Oil Company have decided to remove from the countryside all the hoardings advertising their respective spirits. One cannot assume that the protests of insignificant people have borne any weight with these mighty combines, but one should not inquire too closely into the motive of the good deed, but rest content in its accomplishment. The ordinary man will, perhaps, not stop even to wonder whether the purpose of the hoardings was already fulfilled, or whether it was found that it could not by these means be fulfilled; but he will certainly wander oftener into the now more scentless air.

The next, and perhaps the last, thing of which we may be rid, is those horrid, ghoulish pumps whence motor spirit may be drawn night and day—things that always make the mechanically governed worlds of H. G. Wells seem a reality.

Women and Parliament.

The other day the Duchess of Atholl spoke at Edinburgh in celebration of her return as the first woman member for Scotland. She seems to have praised the Scots for having been so slow in electing women, and it would be ungallant for a mere Southerner to decry the inferences from this. But it may be pointed out that a Scotsman profits even more by his own mistakes than by other people's, and undoubtedly he is rejoicing in the fact that, whereas England is floundering under the frolicsome burden of seven lady members, his own country is content to proceed in the smallest way upon a remediable experiment. The business of women in Parliament, the Duchess said, is to contribute something of distinctive value to the common stock; perhaps it may not be until the advent of a Labour Government that the impossibility of such a contribution is demonstrated!

Parliamentary Affairs.

As far as one can glean, the end of the Conservative Government is to be brought about as quickly as possible. The King's Speech will be read on January 15, and the next day Liberal and Labour votes will cause Mr. Baldwin and his followers to change their seats in the House. If Mr. Ramsay MacDonald becomes Prime Minister, his Ministry will sit on the Treasury Bench, with the Liberals also on the Government side of the House.

What will happen after that is conjecture. Some say that Mr. Asquith will get the power which he wants without a dissolution; others excitedly declare that for the King to withhold permission from the Labour Leader to appeal to the country would be a calamity. Now if this merely meant that the King were in any way opposed to the Labour Party, undoubtedly it would be a lamentable proceeding, but if it signified that the King intended to play a more important part in our national politics it would be a hopeful sign. There are shrewd judges who believe that the political salvation of England lies in a decline of the power of the Cabinet and in an increase of power to the Monarchy.

The other important matter, the creation of an anti-Labour Party (or the attempt to abolish the three-party system) still pursues its goalless path. Every foolish person in the country seems to be writing to the effect that some conviction or slogan must be found to unite Conservatives and Liberals against the Socialists; they do not stop in their dread and fear to reflect that convictions are not "found" and cannot be manufactured. The Labour Party is the party of the immediate future, because in it alone is found any scope for ideals—and one does not overlook the fact that the nearer those ideals approach to practicability, or, worse still, to probability, the weaker the party becomes. But, without much doubt, the less trammelled intellect of the nation is now in sympathy more with Labour than with either of the two other parties. Faute de mieux, of course.

Liubliana, December 20.

The Skupshtina.

The Government's attempt to get the ordinary Budget passed in the Skupshtina before the end of the year has failed, and it was forced to submit dvanajnestine ("twelfths," or monthly Budgets) for January, February, and March instead.

These monthly Budgets give us nothing new. The Minister of Finance points out with some pride that no new taxes are necessitated by them. They are, in the main, a repetition of those that have gone before, with the exception of two points. By the first, 100 million dinars are demanded in order to provide advances to State employees, and by the second a new credit for the settlement of outstanding Government contracts. Finally, the Minister of Finance pointed out that by the monthly Budgets a saving has been effected, inasmuch as the estimates of the ordinary Budget are thereby compelled to stand over.

There was a twofold reason that the ordinary Budget—the first non-fictitious one yet laid before this country—was not carried. For one thing, the Opposition was so exasperated by the repeated rejections of its amendments that it revenged itself by consistent obstruction in the Finance Committee; for another, dissensions kept on breaking out in the Government majority itself, and M. Pashitch was frequently called upon either to compose differences in his own club or to pacify the Turks and Germans, who repeatedly proved recalcitrant and voted against the Government.

The opposition of the Germans and Turks was not on principle, of course. National minorities, especially if they are cut off from the homeland of their language, cannot do otherwise than practise a policy of opportunism. The insubordination of the Germans and Turks was only a protracted exploitation of the position, and has proved completely successful, particularly in the case of the Turks, who, by their astute tactics, exacted from the Radicals the fulfilment of all their desires—or, at least, the guarantee for it. The success of the Turks apparently emboldened the Germans to take up a more energetic stand as regards their own wishes, and as the Radicals showed no great inclination to comply, the Skupshtina experienced the sensation of seeing the Germans vote against the monthly Budgets, albeit with plausible excuses.

The monthly Budgets were rushed through the division, as the position in the Skupshtina has grown so much worse on account of the affair of the Shipping Syndicate that a further sitting of the Skupshtina did not seem desirable to the Government.

The "Panama" that Failed.

The recent affair between MM. Laza Markovitch and Rankovitch had already shown that there exists in the Radical Club a strong movement in favour of a "cleaning up" process. M. Rankovitch may not have been the best man for the job, but, as leader of the Agrarian Deputies, he was probably the most inclined for it. The affair was not properly threshed out, but it led to the resignation of M. Markovitch. He was followed shortly afterwards by M. Uzunovitch, and now we have the resignation of M. Yankovitch, and that because of the Shipping Syndicate, as follows:—

M. Yankovitch, as Minister of Traffic, worked out a scheme in conjunction with Dr. Koyitch, Minister of Commerce, whereby all the shipping and tugs of Yugoslav river traffic were to be brought into one syndicate. Most of this shipping, including tugs, is the property of the State, and its value was technically estimated at a milliard, but commercially at three milliards. The largest owner, after the State, is the Serbian Shipping Company. Under M. Yankovitch's scheme, all existing owners were to form a company in which the State was to hold 51 per cent. of the shares and the other partners 49 per cent. Of these 49 per cent., 11 per cent. were to be allotted to the Serbian Shipping Company and part were to be taken up by subscribers in all parts of the country. This scheme was actually carried through, and capitalists from all regions in Yugoslavia were represented in the committee which was to see to the taking up of the shares. Croat, Serb, and Slovene capitalists alike worked with brotherly interest in this business.

To this new Shipping Syndicate the State, under M. Yankovitch's scheme, was to guarantee incredible privileges—immunity from all taxes (State as well as communal), privileges on the railways, 7 per cent. guaranteed interest upon the shares, and much else. Not until the whole project was well under way, all appointments made, and full-page prospectuses were already appearing in the Press, did it occur to M. Yankovitch that he had better have his scheme confirmed by the Radical Club and the Skupshtina.

M. Yankovitch fell for the following reasons:—

(1) In his scheme the shipping owned by the State was valued, roughly speaking, at 500 millions below its proper value, to the advantage of the other shareholders.

(2) The State was certainly to own 51 per cent. of the shares, but only to dispose of one-third of the votes in the executive.

(3) The whole project was laid before the club in a manner so tactless that it could not fail to offend all the members.

The result was a stormy rejection of the whole scheme and the resignation of M. Yankovitch. A panama (as they call it here) was thus averted, and in Belgrade it is added that a considerable share of the credit for this is due to the Crown.

Foreign Policy.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs has made a statement on the foreign situation. He laid stress upon the fact that Yugoslavia's relations with all other States show marked improvement, especially in the case of the neighbour States. There are, however, many quarters in Belgrade where the Foreign Minister's rosy view is not shared, more particularly because of relations with Bulgaria, the events in Greece, and the action ascribed to Roumanian Court circles. In Belgrade Roumanian influence is suspected in both Bulgarian and Greek affairs.

Floods in Slovenia and Croatia.

As a result of the extraordinarily heavy rains in the Alpine regions in the latter part of November, the Save and its tributaries in Slovenia and Croatia overflowed their banks, and for over a fortnight the whole Save basin down to Zagreb suffered cruelly from inundations, in some places the worst on record. Roads, bridges, and the valley railway became impassable, and great damage has been done to property. Traffic over the line through Upper Carniola was interrupted, and not fully restored until December 16. One day even the Simplon Orient Express could not proceed from Liubliana to Zagreb by the usual line, but had to take another route. Zagreb has been hard hit by inundations, as part of the town was submerged; and the plain around Liubliana was once more temporarily a lake, as in olden times. Funds have been opened in aid of the distressed districts.

GREECE.

Athens, December 15.

The Royalist Demonstration.

Athenians never tire of demonstrations, and we have had four within the last five weeks. An enormous crowd attended the meeting held last Sunday in the spacious square of the Temple of Olympian Zeus, to express its loyalty to King George II., and to protest against any change in the Constitution. Unlike the previous Sunday's Venizelist demonstration which passed off without a single incident, the Royalist meeting unfortunately ended up in a collision between the demonstrators and the troops entrusted with the maintenance of public order, with the result that eight persons were killed and 28 wounded, two of the latter subsequently dying of their wounds. The shooting commenced soon after the demonstrators, returning from the Temple of Jupiter, had reached the beginning of Kephisia Avenue where the offices of the Revolutionary Committee are situated. The crowds there were so dense, and there was such a pandemonium of shouts at the time that it was almost impossible to tell who fired the first shot. The Venizelists claim that it came from the direction of the crowd, but the Royalists maintain that the soldiers guarding the Revolutionary headquarters were the first to fire. Both sides are probably equally responsible, but the fact remains that since Sunday the bitter hatred between the two rival parties has become so intense that fresh disturbances, on a much larger scale, and with very grave consequences for the country's future are likely to break out any day.

The Elections.

To-morrow the Greeks go to the polls. That is, half the Greeks, because the other half, disapproving of the recent electoral changes decreed by the Revolutionary Committee, such as the introduction of balloting in certain areas, and the permission granted to the refugees to vote with the others instead of separately, have decided to abstain from the elections. In the three leading Greek towns, Athens, Piræus and Salonika, there is not a single anti-Venizelist candidate, and as the few Independent, Labour, and Communist candidates who are opposing the Venizelists stand very meagre chances of success, the 100 odd seats in these three towns will be easily captured by the Liberals and the Democrats. The only anti-Venizelist group which will participate in to-morrow's elections is that under M. Triantaphyllakos, an ex-Prime Minister and High Commissioner for Greece in Constantinople during the first half of 1922. M. Triantaphyllakos's group, which is standing in the province of Arcadia, in the Peloponnesus, is assured of a sweeping victory, seeing that the Peloponnesus always has been the bulwark of anti-Venizelism. This group, and a number of ostensible Independent, but in reality anti-Venizelist candidates, who should also prove successful, will probably be the only anti-Venizelist representatives in the next Constituent Assembly. Thus the united Liberals and Democrats will be able to carry on unobstructed, in view of the fact that there will be no Opposition to speak of. Moderate political circles here are of opinion that in such circumstances the new Voulé cannot live long. They confidently declare that none of the Great Powers will recognise the new Government, and predict a quick dissolution of the Chamber, and the holding of fresh General Elections within the next three or four months.

Meanwhile, M. Venizelos' supporters are doing their utmost to persuade their absent leader to return to this country after the elections. As all their efforts have so far failed, it has been decided that a deputation of "twenty eloquent Venizelists" proceed to Paris in the hope of succeeding where so many others have failed. In order to ascertain whether the Greek people really desire his return, M. Venizelos's candidature has been put forward in fourteen important provincial centres, as well as in Athens and the Piræus. The abstention of the "antis," however, will entirely spoil this pseudoplebiscite, seeing that the result of the Greece and Albania.

It looks as if there was something in General Metaxas' statement to the Paris Matin to the effect that in order to divert the attention of the Greek public from the internal imbroglio, the Greek Government would endeavour to create an external "affair." The official communiqué, announcing the diplomatic rupture with Albania—fortunately only partial, seeing that the First Secretary of the Greek Legation at Durazzo had been instructed to remain there and carry on—caused a good deal of astonishment here, as no one even knew that the Albanian Press Bureau had published a defamatory pamphlet against the Greek people and the Army, or that the Hellenic Government had instructed its representative to demand satisfaction. The Albanian Minister in Athens, M. Frasheri, seemed to be equally surprised at the news, and after communicating with Tirana informed the Greek Prime Minister, Colonel Gonatas, that his Government would not be unwilling to publish an official denial of the contents of the pamphlet. The Albanian Government, however, added M. Frasheri, could not comply with Greece's demands to dismiss the Director of the Albanian Press Bureau, who was responsible for the publication of the pamphlet, as that gentleman had in the meantime tendered his resignation, which had been accepted. These explanations having been considered satisfactory, the Hellenic Government telegraphed to M. Panourgias to remain at his post. Apparently, however, the telegram reached Durazzo too late, as M. Panourgias was already en route for Greece, no doubt extremely pleased at the bright prospect of spending the holidays in Athens.

Miscellaneous News.

M. George Rallis, leader of the Conservative Party (anti-Venizelist), and son of the late Prime Minister, M. Demetrius Rallis, has left for Paris, London and Rome. Venizelist circles here believe that the object of M. Rallis's visit to the above capitals is to acquaint official circles there with the real internal situation in Greece, and to ask the Powers to intervene.

Speaking to friends, Colonel Plastiras, the revolutionary chief, said that as soon as the Revolutionary Committee has handed over to the new Government, he will take a short holiday in Karditsa (his native town), and afterwards go to Switzerland. It is eleven years since Colonel Plastiras visited his home.

According to a report submitted to the Ministry of National Economy by the Chamber of Commerce at Kavalla, the demand for tobacco has decreased considerably lately in the Kavalla region. This should be attributed to the instability of the exchange, which makes purchasers very cautious.

Thirteen of the rebel officers who were condemned to imprisonment for life have been removed to the old Turkish prison Ijzedin, in Crete. Thirty-three of the acquitted officers who are considered "dangerous" were also conveyed to Crete until after the elections.

ROUMANIA.

The French Loan.

In last month's letter mention was made of the negotiations which had been begun with a French group for a loan to Roumania. This French financial group, represented by the firm of Dreyfus and supported by M. Poincaré, offered an advance of 350 to 400 million French francs against the cession to them of the redevente or percentages due to the Roumanian Government of the production of the State Oil Lands leased to exploiting companies. At the moment when the matter appeared to have been arranged in principle, and M. Victor Antonescu and M. Mrazec were about to leave for Paris, the French group changed the form of their offer. Their new offer was to advance one milliard French francs, of which 500 million to be payable immediately, and 500 million after one month, on the basis of the foundation of a Franco-Roumanian petroleum company, in which the majority interest must be Roumanian, in accordance with the formula dear to M. Vintila Bratianu. This society was to receive the exclusive concession of the Roumanian State lands and the cession of all redevente. The French group suggested sending two delegates to Bucharest to collaborate in the editing of the new mining law so as to bring it into accord with their plans. M. Vintila Bratianu replied by a telegram expressing his surprise and regret that the first proposal had been modified and refusing categorically to consider the second. Negotiations still appear to be proceeding without, however, making much progress.

The Bucharest Municipality is also trying to raise a loan abroad to enable it to take the necessary steps towards improving the lighting plant and the water supply of the city, both of which are entirely inadequate to meet the requirements of the greatly-increased population since the War.

Miscellaneous.

The convention and protocols of the agreement between Roumania and Yugoslavia were signed last week at Belgrade at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs by the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the two countries. Three communes of the Roumanian Banat have been ceded to Yugoslavia in return for the town of Jombolia. The change will be carried out as soon as a copy of the convention has been communicated to the Inter-Allied Frontiers Commission.

Another serious explosion occurred about the end of November at the fort of Kitila, near Bucharest, and it is reported that an ammunition train narrowly escaped ignition, which might have blown up the whole city.

The Treason Trials.

The one topic of the day is the treason trials going on at the Findikli Palace, and if the Press is giving us a complete account of the proceedings, it would appear that the tribunal has been unable to get on to anything more serious than a journalistic indiscretion on the part of the editors who have been arraigned before it.

It is noteworthy that another attempt has been made in the Assembly to prevent any ill-considered drastic action by proposing that no death penalty that may be imposed by the tribunal may be carried out without being first submitted to the Assembly. The proposal was, however, defeated.

Concessions.

The various questions concerning concessions are not proceeding towards solution with startling rapidity. Everything points to the annulling of the Chester Concession. The Anatolian railway affair is still in a state of stalemate. The principal competitors now appear to be the old concessionnaires represented by M. Huguenin and the Swiss group represented by Colonel Fonjallaz. The original decision of the Ministry of Public Works to hand the railway to M. Huguenin's group has been reversed by a special commission; Mukhtar Bey, the Minister, sticks to his guns; the Assembly is against Mukhtar Bey; he threatens to resign; the Cabinet may provoke a vote of confidence on the matter—and there we are! The whole question now hinges on the doubtful point whether Colonel Fonjallaz can and will supply the Turkish Government with the necessary funds for the purchase of the line on their terms.

A Municipal Incident.

Constantinople has been dull for the past week, except for the quarrel between the electricity company and the Prefecture. The latter, apparently, is dunning the company for the payment of a large sum which it maintains is due to it for import tax on a large quantity of mazout that the company imported some years ago in order to keep up the supply of current when coal was practically unobtainable. As far as can be ascertained from the conflicting reports, the Prefecture has denounced the old contract made between the company and the then prefect, Djemil Pasha, and is now claiming the import tax on the present scale. After an attempt to seize a certain amount of the company's property, such as its exhibition of electrical appliances, its motor-cars, the Prefecture has, it is reported, received a hint to be a little less drastic, and now amicable pourparlers are going on with the object of compromise.

The Pera Palace.

The Pera Palace Hotel is open again under the old management, I believe. Nevertheless, the authorities are still advertising that it is for sale or hire, and the old proprietors are advertising that it will take proceedings against anyone who buys or rents it.

Christmas.

It is Christmas Eve, and all the foreign colonies are preparing to celebrate the festival. The various hotels and restaurants are spreading in reveillons to-night. Yesterday, as a complete surprise after the extraordinarily fine autumn, we woke to find ourselves under a few inches of snow, which remained white and hard for a few hours under the influence of a fiendishly cold N.E. gale. However, a white Christmas now looks improbable, for the wind has changed to the west, and there are deluges of rain.

The Exhibition.

A fortnight ago the Crown Prince, attended by the Royal Princes, performed the opening ceremony of the National Exhibition of Arts and Industries, in the presence of the Prime Minister, Cabinet Ministers, and notables, and representatives of the foreign Powers and European institutions. The organiser of the exhibition, Mohtashem es Saltaneh, ex-Minister of Public Instruction, having read the opening address to His Royal Highness, the latter briefly replied declaring the exhibition open. The Valiahd spent some time examining the various exhibits before leaving.

This exhibition, the first of its kind to be held in Persia, is really quite ambitious, and the Committee of Organisation deserve great praise for their successful efforts. Every native industry is represented, and the exhibits include specimens of the various mineral and other resources of the country. The attendance has been quite satisfactory, the small charge made for admission—one kran (about 5d.)—rendering it accessible to all classes. The Russians have a pavilion of their own, over which floats the Red flag, and their exhibits consist mainly of agricultural implements and machinery. Several similar looms and machines, mostly for weaving, have been ordered from England, but have unfortunately not yet arrived here.

Khalessi.

Ayatollah Khalessi, the Persian Shiah priest deported from Irak recently, who has been staying with the other Ulema at Kum, arrived here from that place last Friday, and is staying outside the town, at the shrine of Shahzadeh Abdul Azim, where a large gathering of representatives of all classes accorded him an enthusiastic welcome and reception. The Prime Minister gave orders for all members of the staffs of the various Ministries to be present, and free tickets on the light railway to Shahzadeh Abdul Azim were provided for those that required them. Khalessi intends to proceed to Meshed after remaining here a few days.

Japanese Mission.

Considerable interest attaches to the arrival here to-day of a Japanese Mission of seven members. It is said that they have been semi-officially sent by the Japanese Government to examine the trade of the country and endeavour to strengthen the commercial relations between Persia and Japan.

PRESS ON THE NEAR EAST.

Greece.

The New Statesman of December 22 says it is a mistake to describe the Greek elections as if they were a parallel to our own. It is under no illusion as to what it conceives to be the reality of the Greek situation :—

> The Greek elections were a mere form, for nearly all the Opposition leaders are in prison or exile, their papers suppressed, their meetings broken up by soldiers and gunmen, and the constituencies grossly manipulated so as to ensure that only Venizelists of one type or another were returned. The Opposition, therefore, abstained. I believe that only one of their candidates remained in the field. The next step, no doubt, will be to make Venizelos President of the new military "Republic." As his hand has been behind the revolutionary tactic, he will probably accept its conclusion, which will be one step more towards the destruction of Greece by party spirit.

Although it takes into account "the manipulation of opinion by the Revolutionary Government" of Greece, the Glasgow Herald of December 24 says that the mass of Greeks have acknowledged that they wronged M. Venizelos in 1920, and continues :—

> If he returns, it is to be hoped M. Venizelos will use his influence from the beginning definitely in the direction of moderating the violent party quarrels and faction fights which are the bane of public life in Greece. On these to a large extent must fall the blame for the present miserable condition of the country, and until the different leaders and their partisans learn a little restraint it is difficult to see how progress can be made towards intelligent self-government. The excesses of the past few years have left deep wounds. Such a crime as the execution of the Gounarist Ministers will never be forgiven by one section of the community, and the participation in politics of those associated with it will always introduce an undesirable element of strife. M. Venizelos himself, unfortunately, if not personally, at any rate through his agents, is to some extent identified with party passions and methods of oppression. To that degree his power for reform is diminished. Yet he remains both in ability and in character head and shoulders above his contemporaries, and Europe would have real hope of the recovery and rehabilitation of Greece under his guidance.

The Khalifate.

In a discussion upon the future of the Khalifate the Manchester Guardian of December 28 says that the presence of the Khalif at Constantinople is now a bitter-sweet blessing. The "Old Turks" disapprove of the innovations of Angora. None the less——

> The possibility of the Khalif's office passing out of the Turkish dynasty into non-Turkish occupation is viewed with profound alarm by the Angorans. There are several possible claimants, one in Morocco encouraged by a French group and another in Asia patronised, it seems, by the Russian Bolshevists. But it is King Hussein of the Hedjaz, the Arab ruler whose aid to the Entente during the war won him a royal crown for his two sons as well as himself, whose intentions are most anxiously discussed. Not only does King Hussein belong to the tribe of Mohammed, Khoreish, but his family rules the sacred cities of Mecca and Medina, lordship of which was once the classic test of a true Khalif. Moreover, he is housing the ex-Sultan, who still claims to be Khalif, at Mecca. Prolonged entertainment of a Khalif has before now led to the assumption of his office by his host, and Angora is wondering whether some such plan is not even now revolving in Hussein's mind.

ORIENTAL LANGUAGES AND RELIGIONS.

For particulars, apply to Sir E. DENISON ROSS, Director

THE LATE MR. ERNEST WEAKLEY.

We much regret to announce the comparatively sudden death at the age of 62, in a London nursing home on December 23, of Mr. Ernest Weakley, C.M.G., who was for many years Commercial Attaché to the British Embassy, Constantinople, but who since the beginning of the War in 1914 had been employed at the Foreign Office. Though he had been in indifferent health for a considerable time, his serious illness in the middle of December, and his demise a few days later, came as a painful surprise even to his immediate friends and colleagues.

The son of the late Rev. R. H. Weakley, of Alexandria, Egypt, he was born on January 7, 1861, and as a child acquired the vernacular of Arabic, Turkish, and French. On his return to the Near East after school in England he improved his knowledge, written and spoken, of those languages, and subsequently entered the service of the Ottoman Public Debt Administration. After a varied experience of the local conditions and the manners and customs of different regions of the Ottoman Empire he was selected for the difficult enterprise of developing the Public Debt saltworks at Salif, on the Red Sea coast, where local Arab obstruction had long defeated the Administration's attempts to work and derive revenue from the existing salt deposits. Mr. Weakley's knowledge of the language and of the idiosyncrasies of the tribesmen, combined with his tact and energy, enabled him to triumph over the local difficulties, and Salif became a successful production centre. He then visited Bombay, Bengal, and other districts in India, to make arrangements for the distribution and disposal of the products of the Salif works. He was later transferred to Central Anatolia, and acquired an intimate and detailed acquaintance with the commercial factors of the Sivas, Angora, and other regions of Western Asia Minor.

In 1897 the British mercantile communities in Turkey felt the need of having attached to the British Embassy, Constantinople, an official equipped with thorough knowledge of the local languages and commercial needs, and Mr. Weakley was appointed to the post of Commercial Attaché.

After successful co-operation at Sofia in the conclusion of an Anglo-Bulgarian Commercial Agreement, he was despatched to Syria and Palestine to report on the special commercial conditions and industrial potentialities of those provinces. His exhaustive report, which is still valuable, gained him the C.M.G. in June, 1908. On the outbreak of war with Turkey his services were utilised in the Contraband Department and subsequently in the Eastern Department of the Foreign Office. There is reason to believe that, if he had lived, he would have received a K.C.M.G. among the New Year Honours.

The funeral service was held at St. Paul's, Onslow Square, S.W., and the burial took place at South Ealing. The funeral service was attended by a number of representatives from the Foreign Office, including a representative of the Secretary of State, Sir William Tyrrell, Messrs. Lancelot Oliphant, G. W. Rendel, V. A. L. Mallet, F. J. R. Rodd, G. P. Churchill, and J. Morgan; by old colleagues in the Near East, including Mr. H. D. Barnham, Sir Harry and Lady Lamb, Mr. G. H. Fitzmaurice, Dr. Clemow, formerly physician to the British Embassy, Constantinople; by Colonel French, Dr. Menzies, and many other personal friends.

The will has recently been published of Mr. Charles William Dawson (69), Chairman of Allen Brothers and Co., Ltd., and of The Near East, Ltd., at one time a member of the Lewisham Board of Works and afterwards of the Borough Council, who left £12,777, net personalty £11,655.

THE YEAR 1923.

II.—Egypt and the Middle East,

For Egypt and the Middle East the word Nationalism is writ large across 1923. In the case of the former it has been the year in which Nationalism has come into its own; the Constitution has been promulgated, Zaghloul Pasha, released from detention abroad, has returned to the country, and elections have been held. Egypt has started an era of independence—an experience withheld from her for more than a score of centuries. She labours, it is true, under certain restrictions, which are held by the more vocal section of her people to be irksome and derogatory; but these in no way affect the freedom that she has now won in the administration of her own affairs, in regard to which she will henceforth stand or fall entirely on her own merits. The year opened with outrages on British subjects still taking place, and the general state of tension was reflected by the resignation of the Nessim Pasha Cabinet, followed by an interregnum of five weeks before a new Prime Minister could be found in the person of Yehia Pasha Ibrahim. The fact that he has remained in office throughout the year is a testimony to his strength of character. The measures that he has carried through as the necessary antecedent provisions to the withdrawal of martial law suggest the wide gulf that separates the irresponsible politician out of office from the Egyptian patriot confronted with the responsibility of administration. Yehia Pasha has offered his countrymen no loophole for impugning his loyalty to Egypt; but he has proved it to be possible for an Egyptian Government to co-operate with the British authorities in a working arrangement for the benefit of the country, and he has had the satisfaction of seeing Zaghloul Pasha modify the terms with which, immediately on his return, he proceeded to assail the politicians who preferred a constructive policy to the administrative deadlock that his own destructive methods inevitably entailed. The honours of the day, however, rest with Zaghloul Pasha, who is assured an overwhelming majority in the Chamber. In spite of an attempt to represent the future of the Sudan as the great question before Egypt, there are abundant signs that internal affairs will supply the dividing lines in Egyptian politics, and Zaghloul Pasha will find office a greater strain on his popularity than exile. It is by no means certain that the country will escape a dynastic crisis. The Nationalist creed at one time made a point of its hostility to King Fuad; latterly there have been attempts on both sides to establish better relations between the Throne and the Zaghloulists; but it remains to be seen whether the Nationalist leader will be able on this point to stand up to the more extremist of his followers. Of Egypt's neighbours it is only necessary to say that the Sudan has maintained the even tenour of its way, with expectation running high of the results likely to accrue from the completion in 1925 of the Makwar Dam, rendering possible the irrigation of a large cotton area in the Gezira. Abyssinia during the year has secured admission into the League of Nations, but it is too early to decide what effect this significant move will have on the fortunes of the country. It is in itself, however, indicative of a recognition of a higher standard of administration and civilisation, and for this reason the step is to be approved.

The constitutional progress that Egypt has made during the year has had no counterpart in Palestine, where there has been no improvement in regard to the Arab-Jew controversy. The establishment of a Legislative Council, on which the Arab population would have been represented by ten elected members, having been frustrated by the Arab boycott of the elections, the British Government proposed to reconstruct the Advisory Council with a view to securing in it effective Arab representation. Ten Arab members were nominated, only to become the object of Arab attack. Four withdrew at once; the remainder wished to make acceptance of their appointment conditional, but in the end also withdrew, and the scheme of a reconstructed Advisory Council was abandoned. As a last resort the British Government offered to recognise an Arab Agency which would be on the same footing as that accorded to the Jewish Agency under the Mandate, and would advise and co-operate with the Palestine Administration in such social and economic matters as affected Arab interests. The suggestion was immediately turned down by the Arab leaders, and the British Government decided that further efforts in the direction of meeting Arab opposition would be useless. It was officially announced that the administration of Palestine would be carried on under the terms of the Mandate with the aid of an Advisory Council, and at a later date this Council was formed exclusively of heads of departments and other Government officials. In the meantime symptoms of divided counsels among the Arabs had been making themselves apparent. The first attempt to escape from the extremist policy of the Arab Congress failed, for the moderates, so-called, threw in their lot with the extremists at the first sign of a trial of strength. There has, however, been formed subsequently a "National Party," which, while identifying itself on paper with the chief items of the programme of the Arab Congress, makes a point of co-operating with the British authorities. This offer, for the time being, has come too late; but, finding themselves now shut out from all say in the administration, the National Party may be able ultimately to win support for its policy of co-operation, and so pave the way for a more rational political system in Palestine.

In the Arab world Irak is conspicuously the pioneer State in ordered government. A Protocol in May modified the Treaty of October, 1922, by providing for British evacuation in four years' time; a purely Arab Government administers the country, with British officials at the disposal of the various Ministers in an advisory capacity. Elections for the Legislative Assembly were handicapped at first by the obstruction of religious leaders, but since the deportation of Sheikh Mahdi al Khalisi, who tried to stir up trouble in Khazimain, a better spirit has prevailed in the Holy Cities, and in due course an Assembly fairly representative of the people will have been constituted. Sir Percy Cox resigned the High Commissionership, and has been succeeded by Sir Henry Dobbs. Two notable events in the development of Irak may be recorded—an extension of the railway system from Hindiah Barrage to Kerbela—a distance of thirty-five miles—and the opening up of a motor mail service between Baghdad and Haifa in Palestine, bringing Irak within ten days' weekly communication with London. A new spirit would seem to be stirring the dry bones of Arab separatism. The presence of three members of the Shereefian family on the thrones of the Hejaz, Irak, and Transjordania serves as a link between these three countries, and during the year the Emir Abdullah at Amman has received a visit from King Faisal, and is at the present moment entertaining his father, King Hussein. Sir Percy Cox was able, before leaving Irak, to bring about the existence of better relations between the Irakis and Ibn Saud, Sultan of Nejd, and a further conference is about to be held at Koweit between representatives of these two countries, of Transjordania and of the Shammar tribes. Although no very definite results may have been reached as yet, it is a notable advance when the warring sections of the Arab world are actuated by a genuine desire to restrict the opportunities for conflict by agreeing upon settled frontiers. For other countries in the Middle East the past year has brought no striking changes. In Persia it is possible that a halt has been called in the frequent ministerial crises by the assumption of the office of Prime Minister by the Sardar Sepah, the strong man of the country, who had previously been content to remain Minister of War in five successive Cabinets. His experience in making and unmaking Governments may enable him, with the support of the Army which he has reorganised, to keep himself in power long enough to do as much for the general administration of the country as he has admittedly done in the sphere of public order and security. Reforming zeal has taken hold of Afghanistan as well, where it is inspired also by one man, the Ameer Amanullah. He has, however, more unruly material to deal with than the Sardar Sepah of Persia, and it would be unsafe to attempt to determine the degree of permanency that reforms launched under the best of auspices are likely to attain among the Afghans.

OLD PLACES OF THE SLAVS.—III.

By W. E. D. ALLEN.

Serajevo, lovely, battered, and sinister, like a much-used woman, bears the marks of all her masters—Turkish walls and towers, Austrian forts upon the hills around, and now the trenches of the Serbs. For centuries the great base of the Turks upon the flank of Hungary, her garrisons successfully guarded the road of invasion into the Balkans—second only in importance to that of Belgrade—the Nishava Valley—or marched against the Habsburg arms across the Save. Later in the last century, her native Janissaries and feudal begs used the great strength of her strategic emplacement to split the Turkish forces in Bosnia from reinforcements coming from Stamboul or Nish; and for years maintained a virtual independence—an oligarchic band of Muslim-Slavic lords and officers, more autocratic than the ruling Padishah, more fanatic than all the race of Ulemas.

Serajevo is the most beautiful of all the Balkan cities. The Turkish town, a place of ragged lanes and crumbling walls and aged towers and sudden turnings, sprawls over a hill, running down into the modern quarter built by Austrians and Serbs. Fountains play in the silent shaded courtyards of the mosques, where rags and prayers are still esteemed before tweeds and a tip; scabby donkeys and bedraggled thin-shanked goats climb the cobbled lanes at ease from the trams of the new town; the things of Manchester and Wien and Pilsen have not yet altogether ousted from the bazaar the small brown bearskins brought in from the hills still blue and blood-dripping; the lace and spun stuff, the silver filigree and pottery and hand-wrought knife-hilts of the villages; and the eager newsboy of the café still gives place to the real whining, whimpering, chuckling, snarling, cursing beggar, an artist in his trade, who crawls on stumps short above the knee, and blackmails the fastidious with a great yellow throat of goitre, rotting cheek-bones, and an oozing eye.

Even the new town of musty, chipped-fronted hotels, solid plain white flats and houses, and cheap shops with dirty plate-glass windows, has an agreeable park where the Christians love most immodestly in the pale blue dusk; and a hot promenade along the wide and shallow Miliaska (The Lovely). Here they will show you the bridge where the Habsburg drove over in his carriage that memorable summer's day, and the young and consumptive Serb fired hectically and hurriedly with a revolver, then jumped in panic over the low wall of the promenade, sixteen feet, on to the rocky bottom of the particularly parched and empty Miliaska.

The road from Serajevo to Mostar passes through a series of mountain ranges, the principal of which is the Belashitsa, and following from Konitsa the valley of the Narenta—here, near its source a young and boisterous torrent—enters the narrow plain at the head of which stands Mostar. The memory of this road is one which the traveller, if he be slave to the gods of Pence, may carry through his life—a memory of joy and majesty that has given to his soul something which the things that bind him cannot take away. It is a scene of desolate and marvellous splendour. Nearly a hundred miles, with only a few straggling grey stone villages, and now and then a solitary hut along the road. The hand of man has made the road, for here first the Romans came and went from Dalmatia to Pannonia, and the hand of man has left the mournful crosses of the dour fanatic Bogumils. There is a scorching, glaring sun, and a sky of deep, hot, perpetual blue. And the road follows the swift, swirling, boulder-cumbered river—here along its rocky shore; here five hundred feet above, scratching along a great grey flank of limestone; here losing it to view behind a massive knife-like crag. All around are the mountains—bare, grey slopes with little patches of brown and green, where a few bushes are scraping life; great towering crags with strange shapes of heads and beards and knives; precipices rising straight from the river, a thousand feet or more, splotched with some black cave, and pouring down, in one place a trickling gleam of water, in another a narrow flashing torrent.

Mostar lies at the end of this long road. It is a winding, narrow street of white-washed houses, with flat roofs and many lattices, courtyards and balconies—half Latin, half Oriental, altogether and uniquely part of this strange land. Mostar is the hottest town in Europe, and has, they say, the same temperature as Jeddah on the Red Sea; the Serb troops go in pith helmets and the Muslim ladies in queer black conical hoods. Mostar is an old fort of war and brigandage; ancient keep of the Slavonic Counts of Khulm, who took their toll on all goods coming up from Ragusa and the coast; later seat of many Turkish pashas, who thought to take advantage of its difficult and formidable strength to make themselves independent of the Padishah.

The wonder of Mostar is the ancient bridge which crosses the Narenta in a single graceful span—a pointed arch of old grey stone flanked by towers on either bank. The foundations are alleged to be of Roman origin, but the existing structure is certainly Turkish. And Hajji Halfa, who wrote at the beginning of the seventeenth century, concerning Roumelia and Bosnia, tells of its building. "Since most of the gardens lie upon the further side of the river, a bridge suspended from chains led across to them; but as the pillars sank it swayed so much that the people feared for their life in crossing it. After the conquest, Sultan Suleiman, at the request of the inhabitants, sent Sinan, the architect, with orders to build a stone bridge. But this man, after he had seen the place, declared the task to be impossible. Later on, a carpenter who was himself living there, offered to make the attempt, and he built the bridge."

South of Mostar the road follows the Narenta valley, passing a mile away to the left the Falls of Buna, reputed to equal those of Jaice. It then turns due east over a rolling plateau of limestone boulders—a desert country of broiling sun and sparse green shrubs of the prickly sort, and they say a breeding-place of serpents. It is a bare and splendid waste—here a miserable group of huts eking round some fœtid well; here some tumbling, forgotten tower or fort of past Turkish-Montenegrin wars, or of the Counts of Khulm, or others longer before; here great rude crosses of ascetic Bogumils defying lords and priests in the free and open boulder-land. We come in the early afternoon to Stolats, a considerable hamlet of rude, white-washed limestone huts, and a jagged lane leading up to the gate of an old castle—once the ancestral seat of the famous Ali Pasha Risbanbegovitch.

From Stolats we came to Liubinye, a considerable and prosperous village, with a grateful grove of trees, where we cooled, and drank Turkish coffee. The men of this part are notably different from the Bosnians, dark-eyed and black-haired in contrast to the frequent fair men of the north; and their dress is after the style of the Dalmatians and Montenegrins, little flat round caps like saucers inverted instead of the fezes and turbans of the north, and shorter jackets.

The Belashitsa Range, between Serajevo and Mostar, which forms the water-shed of streams flowing north to the Save and into the Danube, and of those flowing south into the Adriatic—it is, in fact, the divide between the Pontic and Mediterranean river systems—seems also to separate the Nordic from the Mediterranean man. For these Herzegovinians and Dalmatians—and, for that matter, the Montenegrins—Slavs though they be in language and culture, are in colouring and physique distinctly of the Mediterranean. In fact, it may be suspected that underneath there persists a strong strain of the Illyrian who, in Roman times, was the kind of man hereabouts. After Liubinye, the limestone wilderness, with its poor patches of soil, which the hard-lived peasants will travel a dozen miles to raise and tend their maize upon—opens upon the swampy plain of the Popovo Polye. This long thin strip of fertile soil between walls of limestone rock has been a cause of much strife in times heretofore; for these rich, swampy patches are so rare in Herzegovina and Montenegro that men have gone on fighting intermittently since the beginning of history to grow their maize with ease upon it, and swell their paunches with malaria.

Further again into the rocky wilderness, while changing a burst tyre, we hear the sound of pipes and come upon a gay wedding party in a cave against the bed of a dried-up stream—strong, well-favoured men, bigger than the Bosnians, with the daring eyes and ready smiles of those who know the wilderness, and great, strapping, comely girls.

In the gathering dusk—the orange, cherry, blue, and purple haze of the wilderness—we see the empty Turkish forts of Trebinje on our left, and turn south-west over an old grey stone bridge towards the last range which hides the sea, and in half an hour we are swerving and twisting down the coast road towards Ragusa.

If Jaice is a piece of the fifteenth century, Ragusa is part of the seventeenth. The newest thing of Ragusa, except a few villas and a very excellent Austrian hotel, is the citadel restored and renovated by Marmont, Duc de Raguse, and Bonaparte's Governor of the Illyrian Provinces, whose cannon still peep out upon the azure waters of the ancient harbour, and the islet of pine trees where the sun-burnt citizens bathe away the easy summer days.

Our two Croat chauffeurs, who had made nine hundred miles of mountain roads, with three burst tyres and innumerable punctures, in just about eight days, turned suddenly from grim and surly fellows into grinning cavaliers. For Ragusa is a gay place, with a spacious café and a cheerful band on a shady slope which overhangs the harbour. Here have taken refuge many of the more prosperous sort of Russians, who have filtered through from Constantinople. And there is joyous bathing all the day, and dancing and songs and drinking in a dozen cabarets late into the warm nights.

Ragusa is a delicious haven in which to lie hid from the gods of Pence, with all Bosnia and Herzegovina behind to wander in, and the stark wilderness of Montenegro further south, and further yet, but only two days by car to Scutari, the welcoming forests of Albania. Meanwhile, in Ragusa, to rest and dream and bathe and read and drink and dance; but the one Englishman we found was a very silent, self-contained and cynical old naval captain, living on his pension in great luxury.

THE GENESIS OF EPIC POETRY.

"THE LAY OF ALHA." A Saga of Rajput Chivalry, partly translated in English Ballad metre by the late William Waterfield, with an Introduction by Sir George Grierson, K.C.I.E. (Oxford University Press. 7s. 6d. net.)

In 1795 Professor Friederich Wolf, of Halle University, advanced the daring theory that Homer was not the sole creator of the "Iliad" and the "Odyssey," and that the groundwork of both of these epics was a mass of ballads and folk-songs which had been handed down by oral tradition. While he did not deny the existence of a supreme genius who had given artistic unity to this raw material, he instanced many anachronisms as proving that it had been rehandled by many generations of commentators. Wolf's thesis raised a mighty flutter in the dovecotes of Hellenic learning, but it is now generally accepted by scholars. A little volume of Rájput minstrelsy, ably edited by Sir George Grierson, goes far to prove that Wolf's conjectures have a solid basis of fact; and the editor's notes enable us to follow every stage in the growth of an epic poem. During the sixties of last century Mr. Charles Elliott, B.C.S., then stationed at Farrukhábád, published a cycle of Rájput folk-songs which he had gathered from the lips of many local bards. It attracted the notice of Mr. Waterfield, Accountant-General of the North-Western Province, whose poetic rendering of the Hindi originals appeared in the "Calcutta Review" of 1875-6. Sir George Grierson has rescued Mr. Waterfield's spirited ballads from the oblivion which attends ephemeral literature, and fashioned them into an epic poem. Its theme is the chequered history of Rájputáná during the twelfth century, when the land was rent by internecine warfare which subsequently made it a prey to Moslem invasion. The battles waged by contending chieftains are recounted as vividly as those which were immortalised by Homer, and customs are described which fill the folk-lorist's heart with delight. Marriage by capture, for instance, prevailed on a scale undreamt of by the savage tribes with whom it originated. A princely suitor was attended by an army, and every ruse known to warfare came into play in his attempt to secure a bride. The gradual growth of the epic is evidenced by anachronisms such as the following verses enshrine:—

They have placed the cannon against the gate,
Proud Lohagarh to quell;
An hundred guns did in order wait
Till the word for onset fell.
An hundred linstocks at once they ply,
And the smoke to the welkin wins;
And word is brought to the King Jambay,
The Mahoba attack begins!
He bade them fire from every gun
That stood on the turrets high;
They light the matches, everyone,
And the cannon-balls roar and fly.
The army of Alhá was troubled sore
As the groaning warriors fall;
In vain did the cannon of Malkhan roar,
They pierced not that iron wall.

Every schoolboy knows that "villainous saltpetre" as an agent in warfare was unknown in the twelfth century. F. H. S.

TWO NOVELS: AFGHANISTAN AND EGYPT.

"THE HEIR OF THE MALIK." By Michael John. (London: Herbert Jenkins. 7s. 6d. net.)

"THE SHADOW OF EGYPT." By Norma Lorimer. (London: Hutchinson. 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Heir of the Malik" is a story of adventure and high endeavour. It ends in tragedy for Philip Carr, who follows the example of John Rosières, whose diary was bequeathed to him, and finds his way far into Afghanistan to the territory of the Malik of Barsak in Kunar. However, the last scene shows the faithful Akhbar Shah escaping to safety with the baby son of Carr and of Dil Afroz, who was the Malik's grand-daughter and the daughter of Rosières. We have no doubt that he will grow into a leader of men. Both Rosières and Carr had that in them that "made all men willingly obey" sufficiently to gain the respect and friendship of the fierce, independent men of the Malik's village. Carr had also the strength to set aside the temptation offered by the riches of the valley beyond "the City of the Dead." It is when other white men appear to exploit the treasure that the Malik fears trouble and treachery. Then Carr's vision of peace and just rule blazes to the sky in the tower where he, his wife, and the white strangers have been imprisoned. Carr's last thought is to wonder what Rosières had meant by "that which is most to be desired in all the world," which he writes is to be found in Kunar. The story is told in a clear, decided style, well suited to the stern, bare mountains of its scene and the matters of life and death with which it deals. The Malik, with the curious twists of his reasoning; Carr, his friend—Akhbar Shah, and the beautiful Dil Afroz are all figures who remain in the memory.

Lilian Westcott lives in Chelsea, and is the bored wife of an artist in black and white. At a dinner party she meets General Haddad, a Syrian Arab, whom she recognises as an affinity. Soon afterwards her husband takes her to Egypt for her health, and there Haddad again appears, and in the end meets his death as a leader of the "Egyptian Fascisti," a body which has, the author assures us, no real existence. Once in Egypt Miss Lorimer lays the local colour on very thick and on the whole effectively. The love between Lilian and Haddad might have conveyed to us the desired impression of spiritual nobility more clearly if it were not for the nicknames by which they invariably call each other. Lilian is "di Milo" because of her exact resemblance to the famous Venus, and Haddad, being a Syrian, is "Wolf." The climax of the story comes during the riots at Assiut in 1919. It is a small detail, but could Lilian in that year have found "Hassan," "by Flecker, the English poet," lying on a table, beautifully bound?

themselves, and had to extend her investigations to labour as a whole; but the book does not cover the entire ground, and, in particular, it tells us very little about mining or agriculture. We are left in some little doubt as to its basis. There is no list of authorities, but the footnotes suggest eclectic rather than exhaustive reading, while the preface speaks of "a visit to India of some sixteen months from December, 1920, to March, 1921," which, by our arithmetic, makes four months only. The treatment is descriptive, and occasionally reflective; there is little attempt at scientific analysis, and the few allusions to history show that the author has accepted at their face value the quaint ideas of some of her informants. Now any advance towards the solution of the complex group of problems arising out of the employment of women in Indian factories must be based largely on history and analysis, so that the book does not carry us much further; but the description is exceedingly well done, and the modest claim that it "will prove useful as an introduction to the study of labour in India" is amply justified by its contents.

ISLAM AT THE CROSS ROADS.

"ISLAM AT THE CROSS ROADS." By De Lacy O'Leary, D D. (London: Kegan Paul. 6s. 6d net).

The author claims for this book that it is "a brief survey of the Present Position and Problems of the World of Islam," but a good deal of it is devoted to historical matter. This, of course, was necessary, for no comprehension of the East, even more so than of the West, can be made without reference to history. Dr. O'Leary is therefore forced to trace the development of Islam, to tell of the reforming movements within it, to show the penetration of the West into it and its reaction against the West, and then only, after having expounded the hopes of Pan-Islam and the force of Nationalism, is he able to get at grips with the present position.

Islam, he states, is in a very critical position, for it is being undermined by scepticism and materialism. The recent reaction against the West, particularly against Great Britain, has not been spiritual but racial, even though Islam has regarded, wrongly, the West as still possessing the Crusading spirit. Of this undermining there is sufficient evidence in the diminishing number of Moslems who perform the haj, which, he says, is the real bond of Islam. Another cause which may contribute to the disintegration of Islam is the rise of the Wahabis, who need no Khalif. He is obviously impressed with the might and the zeal of Ibn Saoud, though he is careful to add that the movement may decline with his death. His conclusion is that both Christianity and Mohammedanism are in danger of extinction from the growth of materialism, and that conflict between them could but promote that extinction. Whether Islam is likely to escape that fate he does not say.

Dr. O'Leary's book contains nothing new to students of the subject, but those whose knowledge of Islam is only superficial will find his story distinctly useful. His work is a review—it does not claim to be research—and on the whole it is an accurate and a balanced review, and does not often recount unessential details. One must comment, however, on the proof-reading, which is execrable. If the book attains another edition, some attempt must be made to correct the more glaring mistakes in spelling, and to bring the punctuation into at least approximate distance of correct usage.

NEWS IN BRIEF.

M. Venizelos left Marseilles for Greece on December 30 on board the Greek steamer Andros.

The Roumanian Chamber has ratified the protocol, signed by Roumania and Yugoslavia, for the exchange of four communes of the Banat.

It is reported from Allahabad that Captain Standen, of the 2/9th Jats, was shot dead on December 22 at Jandola, Waziristan, by a sepoy who ran amok.

Mr. William Buchanan, who served in the China War, the Crimean War, the Baltic Expedition, and the Indian Mutiny, died at Portsmouth last week at the age of ninety.

Prince Cyril, brother of King Boris of Bulgaria, arrived in Sofia on December 25. King Boris's sisters, the Princesses Eudoxia and Nadejda, have also returned to Bulgaria.

Dr. Yankovitch, Yugoslav Minister of Communications, has resigned. Pending the reconstruction of the Cabinet, the portfolio will be taken over by the Minister of Commerce.

Mr. St. John Philby, the British Political Officer, and the Emirs Skahir and Tallal left Amman for Akaba on Christmas Eve to meet King Hussein, who is paying a visit to Transjordania.

General Sir William Birdwood unveiled, at Ferozepore, Punjab, on December 3, two memorials to officers and men of the Punjab Regiment who fell in the Great War. The memorials stand opposite each other on the Mall.

The new branch of the railway from Hindiyeh Barrage to Kerbela was opened by the King of Irak on December 10. The line now gives through connection for pilgrims from the Persian frontier to Kerbela. After the ceremony the King left for a tour to Nejef and the Shamiyah district.

Colonel Algernon George Arnold Durand, C.B., C.I.E., of Egerton Gardens, S.W., first British Resident in Gilgit, who saw service in the second Afghan War, author of "The Making of a Frontier," who died on October 7, aged 69, left estate of the gross value of £1,549, with net personalty £163.

After long negotiations on matters not settled at Lausanne an agreement was signed at Constantinople on December 24 between the United States and Turkey, whereby, within six months of the exchange of ratifications of the Lausanne Treaty, a mixed commission will meet to regulate questions relative to the War indemnity claims of American nationals.

NOTES AND NEWS.

Tuesday Morning.

The Outlook for 1924.

If there are any business men who viewed the passing of 1923 with something akin to regret, it would be a most interesting experience to meet them. In broad outline, the past twelve months has spelt the continuance of the extreme trade depression with which we have been familiar so long, though the year has not been without redeeming features which were not to be found in 1922. Unhappily, the exchanges have again shown no improvement, and in a number of cases have gone from bad to worse, but during the last few months a tendency (which the untimely General Election has so far failed to alter) to improving trade has been distinctly in evidence. More orders have been forthcoming for engineering firms, while the demand for general merchandise has shown signs of improvement. It would be unwise to base too great hopes on this account, but there really seem grounds for anticipating that 1924, given that there are no adverse political developments, will mark a definite turning point on the road to the reconstruction of world trade. One of the most hopeful features of 1923 was, of course, the settlement at long last with Turkey. If it had taken place when it should have done its influence on the commercial situation would have been immediate and pronounced. Unfortunately, the exhaustion of Turkey makes it only too evident that it will be some time yet before that market can be an appreciable factor in world trade. Apart from Turkey, the outlook in the Near East is certainly more encouraging. In Greece the political difficulties of the last few months have naturally had a very marked effect on commerce, and the growing confidence that may be anticipated as a result of the return of M. Venizelos should have a notable repercussion on trade activities. In Roumania, too, the outlook is now much better in consequence of the new regulations introduced by the authorities, the effect of which, it may be hoped, will be to allow the country to profit by its great natural resources.

The Conference and the Election.

The position with regard to the Government's proposals at the recent Imperial Conference concerning the extension of preference in respect of certain commodities has been rendered very obscure by the result of the General Election. It would be exceedingly unfortunate, to put it very mildly, if, in consequence of the alteration in the strength of the various parties in the House of Commons, these proposals should be nullified. Yet it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that there must be a strong probability that this will happen. The proposals have to receive the sanction of the House, and this now requires the active or passive assent of the Opposition, which outwardly appears to be pledged to the defence of Free Trade, though there is little doubt that a very large proportion of the Labour Party are in reality anything but upholders of that doctrine. From every point of view it would be very regrettable if it were made to appear that matters concerned with Imperial development were to become, so to speak, the sport of rival parties, and it can only be trusted that advantage will be taken of the present occasion to lay down the precedent that subsequent political happenings will not be allowed to interfere with decisions at the Conferences.

The Cotton Crisis.

The current issue of the American review Foreign Affairs contains a very interesting article on the cotton crisis by Professor J. A. Todd, who points out that it may be taken that the world requires twelve million bales of American cotton per annum as a minimum, and that that figure now represents the probable maximum of the crop. "Such a situation," he adds, "can only result in periodic scarcity until the supply is increased. It therefore becomes of the first importance to consider the prospects of such an increase." He gives in tabular form details of the world's supply of cotton of fine, medium, and short staple, showing that while the average pre-war crop of the world totalled 25,137,000 bales, the average post-war crop is no more than 20,205,000 bales. The special interest of the statistics lies in the light thrown on the very small supplies of cotton that are as yet forthcoming from within the Empire. Leaving Egypt out of account, the total contribution of the Empire to the post-war total is only 4,104,000 bales, and of that India supplies 4,000,000, and as much of that is not capable of being used by Lancashire spinners, the real contribution is, of course, very considerably less. The figures given, as I have mentioned, represent the average post-war crops, but, making allowance for the improvement that has been made, they bring into clear relief the enormous leeway that has to be made up. Much time must elapse before the Sudan is producing, say, 500,000 or 1,000,000 bales, but even the latter figure, large as it is, only represents a small proportion of the world's cotton supply, though it would mean a very substantial contribution to the supply of long staple cotton, the average post-war crops of which amount to only 2,030,000 bales.

Dacia Romano.

At the meeting of the Dacia Romano Petroleum Syndicate the chairman, Mr. F. J. Nettlefold, was able to give a satisfactory account of the company's progress. There was a loss for the year ended March 31 of £9,500, the actual loss on working being £3,600, but Mr. Nettlefold stated that if it had not been for their misfortune at Moreni Well No. 1, the year's work would have shown a profit. The output for the period was 5,260.60 tons, an increase on the previous year of 2,396 tons, while for the current year up to the end of November the production is 8,870 tons. "When the wells now actually in progress are completed," Mr. Nettlefold pointed out, "it is reasonable to anticipate that with five producing wells on the Moreni field, two at Chichiura, and three at Baicoi, we should be well on the way towards keeping our refinery fully supplied with our own production. When that stage has been reached we shall possess an undertaking capable of earning satisfactory profits. Our goal must be production of crude oil in quantities sufficient to keep our refinery constantly and fully employed. . . . We shall spare no effort to reach that goal, and I think we are within measurable distance of attaining it."

The Late Mr. Harry Hunter.

I regret to have to record the death, suddenly, on December 31, of Mr. H. E. R. Hunter, a director of the Imperial Bank of Persia and of Hambros Bank. After many years' service in the Far East with the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, Mr. Hunter took up his residence in England some ten years ago. He will be missed by a wide circle of friends, both in the business and in the social world.

Shipping Intelligence.

SHIPPING DEPRESSION IN 1923.

Messrs. Turner, Davidson and Co. in their report on shipping in 1923 state:—

The passing year has been a depressing one for shipowners. The paucity of employment and the low level of freights have been reflected in the lower prices for tonnage, and generally values may be said to have dropped to the extent of 7½ per cent. to 10 per cent. below those ruling at the beginning of the year. The outstanding auction of 1923 was held in June, when four 8,000-8,200 tonners, built between 1919 and 1920 in Hong Kong to the order of the Ministry of Shipping, but resold to a Greek shipowner, were sold under the hammer and acquired by British shipowners for a total price of £158,750, or about £4 17s. per ton, together with two 5,100 tonners, similar to English "C" standard boats, built at Shanghai, for £26,000 each. The loss on this fleet alone must have been considerably over a million pounds sterling.

Two important decisions were announced during the year, one an invitation to bid for twenty-seven of the smaller boats owned by the Canadian Merchant Marine, the second the placing upon the market of thirty-two of the older boats handed over by the Australian Government to the Australian Shipping Board, now controlling the Australian Commonwealth Line. In the case of the Canadian steamers very little progress has so far been reported, only three steamers having been sold, but about half of the Australian fleet has been disposed of to Australian, Japanese, and British buyers at prices round about £3 per ton d.w. for steamers of fifteen to seventeen years old, and about £7 per ton for the modern Australian-built boats.

The breaking-up market has been the chief outlet for old tonnage, Germany, Italy, and Holland being the principal buyers in the order named. The terrible earthquake in Japan resulted in a demand for secondhand tonnage up to 9,000 tons, and a large number of boats bound to and in Eastern waters have been sold.

The market for colliers having kept strong, has given work to many yards for the building of self-trimmers from 2,000 to 3,500 tons d.w., whilst Canada, having been able to get on during the early part of 1923 at sufficiently low prices, placed orders for a number of boats for use on the Canadian Lakes. The quantity of British and foreign tonnage laid up in United Kingdom ports up to the quarter ending October 1, 1923, is given as 755,101 tons, of which 727,134 tons is British owned. This is an increase of 45,999 tons, or 6 per cent. more than on July 1, but a decrease of 8½ per cent. for the corresponding period ending October, 1922. It is an anomaly that, while freights in most directions and prices of secondhand tonnage are lower than last year, the cost of new tonnage has increased by at least 10s. per ton, chiefly owing to the rise in steel plates.

THE TURKISH MERCANTILE MARINE.

The November issue of the Bulletin of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Constantinople gives some interesting data regarding the increase of the Turkish mercantile marine since the end of the war. At the conclusion of hostilities the Turkish merchant fleet was reduced to 50,000 tons, composed mostly of old and worn-out vessels. On November 1 last the merchant fleet consisted of 456 units of 82,948 tons. The Seir Séfaine possesses thirty-five vessels of 37,494 tons, including six of more than 3,000 tons each, the largest vessels flying the Turkish flag; the Chirketi Hairie, twenty-seven vessels of 4,815 tons; and the Cie des bateaux de la Corne d'Or, sixteen vessels of 1,397 tons.

The same issue of the Bulletin contains a report of a speech on the Turkish merchant fleet to the effect that the fleet is far from corresponding to the country's needs not only from a passenger point of view, but also as regards freight. Since the Turkish merchant service has been firmly established in Turkish waters the owners have been able to organise the transport of the imports and exports of the country. The coastal traffic has been reserved to the Turkish flag by the Treaty of Lausanne, which, it is pointed out, has compelled foreign countries to recognise Turkish ships entering foreign ports.

NEW B.I. MOTOR SHIP.

The launch took place recently at Newcastle of the motorship Kistna, built for the British India Steam Navigation Co., Ltd., by Messrs. Swan, Hunter, and Wigham Richardson, Ltd., at their Neptune Works. The Kistna, which is 287 ft. in length by 40 ft. beam, is designed to carry about 1,650 tons total deadweight on a mean draft of 15 ft. The appliances for operating the ship and cargo include an electric windlass, electro-hydraulic steering gear, and five 3-ton electric winches. The propelling machinery consists of a set of "Neptune" reversible marine oil engines of the two-cycle type with six cylinders, and the vessel will have a speed of from 10½ to 11 knots.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS.

CYPRUS, December 1.

The carob market shows a better tone, and prices locally are hardening. There is a continued demand for barley from Smyrna.

JAFFA, December 1.

Owing to the poor prices obtained, shipments of oranges to the United Kingdom have been stopped temporarily. Rain is badly needed for the crops.

HAIFA, November 24.

There has been no important change in prices in the grain market. There has, however, been an increase in offers, which has resulted in a hardening of rates, but the close of the week has been marked by a small fall.

HAMADAN, November 24.

Wheat has fallen to 100 krs. per khalvar of 400 kilos. Barley is selling at 85 krs. per khalvar. There is no change of importance in other markets.

BASRAH, November 24.

The cultivators are waiting for a good rainfall, which has been delayed this year in the Basrah region. Exporters are satisfied with the news from London regarding the prices of dates and cereals.

NABLUS, November 24.

There has been some activity in oils. The market remains firm, and buying continues for the local soap factories.

There is no change as regards cereals. There has been a small rise in the price of wheat, and some small lots of sesame have been sold for Jerusalem and the towns of the interior.

CONSTANTINOPLE MARKET FOR SHOE POLISH.

The bootblack is a common sight in Constantinople, and he is rarely idle (says an American Consular report). At least one-fourth of the city's population is his customer; even children are often seen spending 5 piastres for a "shine" and take pride in the lustre of their footwear. It is estimated that from $18,000 to $30,000 (roughly £4,150 to £6,900) worth of shoe blacking or polish is consumed annually, and that a good quality polish, costing less than 75 cents per lb., would find a ready market here. The best qualities of polish are obtained from the United States and England, but they are considered too expensive. A medium quality is imported from France, and the cheapest grades are furnished by Germany, which sells the greatest quantities in Constantinople. The local product is of an inferior quality, and is used to only a slight extent.

It is the custom here to apply a liquid paste to the shoe, which is permitted to dry, and then brushed. This paste is usually contained in 100 to 120 gramme (4-ounce) square, screw-top glass bottles. A colourless paste or cream is then applied to the leather and rubbed to a high polish. This cream is sold to the trade in small, medium, and large-size flat tins, the total quantity amounting to about one-third of the entire shoe polish sold. It is advisable to furnish the Turkish market with these products put up in tins in order to avoid paying an excessive duty on the containers. The blacking liquid or paste can easily be bottled locally. The most popular colours are black and cordovan; white shoes, which are very popular for summer wear, are cleaned with a hard white substance applied with a sponge.

DRIED FRUIT REPORT.

Messrs. J. C. Houghton and Co., of Liverpool, report as follows under date January 1:—

Currants.—Looking back upon the events of the past season, the outstanding feature which forces itself upon our notice is the extent to which trade has been influenced by the sharp, and at times even violent, fluctuations in the Greek exchange, a very disturbing element which has made anything in the nature of stability of markets quite impossible. In the early days of September considerable excitement was caused by the alarming Greco-Italian crisis, which at one time looked like developing into actual hostilities, and this period of ferment provided an excellent opportunity for holders of old stocks to dispose of the fruit to considerable advantage. Their gain was, however, secured at the expense of future trading, for its adverse influence was very marked when the first arrivals of new fruit came to hand, this being followed by demoralisation of the exchange rates in October, which brought about a distinct fall in values, the brunt of the decline being felt by the commoner grades. Vostizza withstood the pressure remarkably, and even stiffened somewhat in many instances.

Domestic politics provided the next vicissitudes, the general election campaign which was so unexpectedly precipitated upon the country in November being a potent factor in reducing the demand, and this was unfortunate, coming just at the time when high hopes were entertained of a final spurt for the Christmas trade. The decisive defeat of the Government in response to the challenge evoked a very reactionary tendency, but the prevailing gloom has to a considerable extent been dissipated by the success of the Venizelists in Greece. The return to his country of this powerful personality has wrought a most beneficial effect on the financial situation there, exchange rates rising sharply with the inevitable corollary of a corresponding advance in the price of the commodity. Many holders have received cables advancing values by several shillings, the year's closing quotations being:—Pyrgos, 44s.; Amalias, 46s.; Zante, 44s. to 46s.; Gulf and Panariti, 48s. to 55s.; Vostizza, 60s. to 72s.; cleaned Provincial, 45s.; cleaned Gulf and Patras, 48s. to 50s. Australian currants selling slowly, 2 Crowns at 53s., 3 Crowns at 58s.

Raisins—Valencia.—The early estimates of a small yield, due to excessive heat and lack of moisture during the critical maturing time, were fully corroborated when the normal period for the season's commencement came round and nothing was available for shipment; in fact, so late was the start that the whole season's business was concentrated within a few weeks embracing the latter part of October and the first portion of November, when extreme prices were realised, ranging as follows:—Half-boxes, 50s. to 57s. 6d. for inferior, and 60s. to 70s. for good; quarter-boxes, 57s. 6d. to 65s. for inferior, 70s. to 80s. for good, and up to 95s. for fine; seedless, common, 45s.; ordinary, 55s.; a few really good, 70s. The bulk of the fruit proved disappointing, being small and unattractive.

Cape Raisins.—Buyers, realising the position as regards Valencias, evinced an increasing interest in the Colonial fruit, and prices steadily appreciated. Sales in August were from 44s. to 48s., finishing in December with keen demand at:—Fair average, 55s. to 62s.; good, 60s. to 65s.; pockets, 3rd grade, 42s. 6d. Australian Lexias also benefited, values advancing from 42s. 6d. to closing quotations:—2 Crowns, 52s.; 3 Crowns, 58s.; 4 Crowns, 60s.

Sultanas.—It was felt that with the heavy stocks held in the United Kingdom new fruit would have to be on a decidedly lower range of values than those ruling last season. Considerable progress was made in old fruit at falling prices, prior to the arrival of the Cressado with the first of the new crop. This cargo was quickly disposed of at 64s. to 75s., while old Smyrnas sold at 50s. to 60s., and old Greeks at 50s. to 52s. Further arrivals were quickly disposed of at prices ranging from 59s. to 65s. for ordinary quality, and up to 72s. 6d. for fine. At one period, aggressive selling forced rates down, and some really excellent quality was sold at 60s. Later, buyers realised the meagre quantity available, and with a revival of demand values quickly took an upward turn, fine grades especially being enquired for, advancing from 70s. to 80s. for good to fine, and from 100s. to 108s. for a few outstanding parcels of fine bleached. A very large business was transacted in good average qualities for forward shipment. Boxes of cleaned from 32s. to 35s. c.i.f., and bags uncleaned from 27s. 6d. to 30s. c.i.f. Old fruit continued to be forced for sale, and Smyrna fruit sold at 40s. to 45s., Greeks at 40s. to 43s. Greek new crop were in small supply, and were difficult of sale at 60s. to 65s., being lacking as regards their usual attractive appearance. Latest reports from Smyrna advise that only 6,000 tons remain, also that the market is strong, with upward tendency. Afghans.—These have depreciated in value, prices ranging for red from 38s. to 32s., latest sale 26s. 6d., yellows, 55s. down to 40s. Australians.—In view of the position, holders reduced their pretensions, and followed the market to meet competitors, selling in August at 70s. to 75s.; recent sales having been 2 Crowns 48s., 3 Crowns 50s. Capes were difficult to move, appearance being unattractive; sundried declining from 57s. 6d. to 45s., and bleached from 60s. to 45s.

Figs.—The abnormal state of affairs existing interfered with the packing of skeleton cases, only moderate quantities being available. These sold readily at full prices, the range being:—Layers, 87s. 6d. to 120s.; locoums, 125s. to 135s.; packets, 100s. to 120s. Bags Naturals opened 34s. to 42s. 6d., closing prices 33s. to 35s. Some forward business was transacted in August on the basis of 21s. to 25s. c.i.f. for genuines.

YUGOSLAV SUGAR BEET INDUSTRY.

The Commercial Secretary at Belgrade has informed the Department of Overseas Trade that at the instigation of the Yugoslav Minister of Agriculture and Waters conferences have recently been held in Belgrade to discuss various questions connected with the production of sugar beet and the beet sugar industry.

An official of the Ministry who assisted at the conferences stated that during the last four years the areas sown with sugar beet were (in hectares):—1920, 15,500; 1921, 17,000; 1922, 19,000; 1923, 24,000. The area under sugar beet is less than the two hundred and fiftieth part of that sown with cereals. The following yields were obtained:—1920, about 2,000,000 quintals; 1921, less than 2,000,000 quintals; 1922, 3,100,000 quintals. Although the yield for 1922 was much better than that of the two preceding years, it was considerably less per hectare than that obtained in most other sugar-beet-growing countries.

No figures are available of the actual consumption of sugar in Yugoslavia, but the demand greatly exceeds the home production, which amounted to:—In 1920, 22,000 tons; 1921, 24,700 tons; 1922, 33,500 tons. The capacity of the sugar factories in Yugoslavia is about 10,000 to 12,000 wagons per annum. Home consumption absorbing 6,000 wagons, it would be possible, working at full capacity, to export 6,000 wagons yearly.

After great discussion between the growers' representatives and those of the sugar manufacturers, the following resolution was made:—"That a consultative commission of growers and manufacturers' representatives should be appointed at the Ministry of Agriculture and Waters, which would control culture, manufacture, and prices. It was decided to encourage by privileges given to the agricultural co-operatives the growing of sugar beet by the peasants. As concerns large estates, the proprietors should undertake to cultivate beetroot on that part of their land left to them above the maximum allowed by the Agrarian Reform Law. The conference demanded the increase of the Customs duty on sugar by two dinars per kilogramme, the granting of a delay of three months to the factories for the payment of the consumption tax, and the construction of special lines for bringing the beetroot to the factories.

LIVESTOCK IN BULGARIA.

The following extracts are taken from the current monthly report of the Bulgarska Banka :—

It is unquestionable that cattle breeding is one of the more important branches of Bulgarian agriculture. According to the census of 1910 there were in Bulgaria 478,322 horses, 12,238 mules, 118,488 asses, 1,606,363 oxen, 412,978 buffaloes, 8,669,260 sheep, 1,464,719 goats, and 527,311 pigs. But the census of 1917 shows a marked decrease in the number of domestic animals, particularly as regards certain kinds. The census taken at the end of 1920 shows a notable increase in all classes of domestic animals except horses, whose number is below the total for 1910. From the point of view of the number of cattle Bulgaria occupies one of the leading positions, but is nearly last as regards quality. The value of the cattle in Bulgaria, calculated at the present market prices is 16 to 20 milliard leva.

The beet crop is estimated this year at 33,000 wagons, which will yield about 40 million kilos of sugar. That quantity exceeds for the first time the needs of Bulgarian consumption by about 15 million kilos, which will be available for export.

The export market remains quiet. Insignificant quantities of grain and tobacco were exported in November.

TENDERS INVITED, ETC.

Tenders are invited for the following contracts, and must be made by the dates mentioned.

(Particulars of tenders marked D.O.T. are to be obtained from the Department of Overseas Trade, 35, Old Queen Street, S.W.).

MARKET FOR ELECTRICAL GOODS IN TURKEY.

Market possibilities, worthy of considerable study and investigation by manufacturers of electrical equipment and supplies, are offered by the district in and around Constantinople (says an American Consular report). There is a large field for the employment of electricity for lighting, heating, power, transportation, electro-chemistry and therapeutics, which is only waiting the more extensive production of current for commercial uses. With the country's return to normal conditions, there will undoubtedly follow a rapid development of Turkey's hydro-electric resources.

The European sections of Constantinople, on both sides of the Golden Horn, are supplied with light and power from the plant of the Société des Tramways et Electricité de Constantinople, which is situated near the upper end of the Golden Horn. Its plant is steam operated, and the system includes 160 kilometres of distributing mains, the current at consumers' terminals for lighting purposes being 50 cycle, 110/190 volt alternating current. There is a distribution sub-station for the municipal sub-division of Stamboul and of Pera, and also for Stenia, a small town on the upper Bosphorus. Buyukdere, another town on the Bosphorus, is being wired for electricity at the present time. About 60 per cent. of the current generated is used for lighting purposes, there being nearly 25,000 consumers, and the remainder is divided equally between the tramcars, mills, and small industries.

Since there is comparatively little current consumed by the small local industries, it is assumed that supplies for house wiring and the allied fixtures and appliances will offer the best sales opportunities. Annual sales of electrical equipment in Turkey are estimated by local merchants to exceed £T400,000 in value. This business is gradually growing in importance. A considerable transit trade might also be developed. It is claimed that local stocks of electrical appliances are nearing exhaustion. They are being gradually replaced by goods of German manufacture, which, as a rule, can be sold more cheaply than the products of other countries.

SMYRNA FRUIT MARKET.

Messrs. C. J. Giraud and Co., of Smyrna, report as follows for the week ended December 15 :—

The arrivals of sultanas in the Smyrna market are estimated at 32,200 tons, and the sales are put at 30,100 tons. A further advance in prices has again been recorded this week. The remaining unsold stocks in the country are variously assessed, but the broad fact remains that operations are becoming daily more difficult owing to the small supplies and the poor selection of sound fruit offering for sale. A brisk demand continues from Continental markets, and the indications point to yet higher prices next week.

The quantity of gold extracted from the mines in India during September amounted to 34,948 oz., valued at Rs. 21,14,777.

The Indo-European Telegraph Company announces a reduced rate for Press telegrams from the United Kingdom, via the company's route for India, Burma, and Ceylon, of 4d. per word.

The Department of Overseas Trade has received from the British Acting-Consul-General at Beyrout a copy of a circular (in French) regarding the presentation or renewal of demands for permits for mining surveys in Syria and the Lebanon. All such demands must be submitted before January 31, 1924.

Cotton and Cotton Goods.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Erratic.

The Alexandria Commercial Co. in its report for the week ended December 14 states :—Since our last report the futures market has been again very erratic, extremely weak sessions intervening with very strong ones; at the close the undertone is rather poor. The feature of the week has been the publication on the 12th ult. by the U.S.A. Government of the final estimate of the American crop, the figure being 10,081,000 bales. This estimate has been rightly interpreted to confirm a severe shortage of supplies for the season, and on its publication the world's cotton markets registered substantial advances. Our market followed suit and recouped a part of the recent drop; the recovery, however, did not go very far, the reason being the heavy losses incurred by many local speculators in the recent heavy fluctuations, and which compelled them to be more cautious in their dealings. As far as the demand from abroad is concerned, it has only been fair, but this is quite natural if one considers that spinners are very seldom in the market when erratic fluctuations take place. At the second tender of December Ashmouni, 6.250 crs. dockets were issued, but this has not had much effect, and this position is still worth ½ dol. more than February Ashmouni, a fact which is certainly an indication of the strength of the Ashmouni position in general. The week's arrivals amount to 308,320 crs., against exports 251,309 crs.; the stock stands at 2,100,414 crs.

Spot.—We have had a fairly active week at Minet el Bassal, and sales amount to about 22,700 bales, of which we estimate 14,700 bales Sakel, 7,700 bales Uppers, 150 bales Brown and Pilion, and 150 bales White. We have had good arrivals, but exports are considerably less than last week, and the stock shows an appreciable increase over last week. There has been a fair inquiry from spinners, but the wide fluctuations in prices, which we have had this week, have probably prevented a fair amount of the inquiry from becoming actual business.

Sakellarides.—All styles have been dealt in, with the medium qualities predominating. Prices of spot against contracts are without much change from last week for grades from Good Fair to Good. Below Good Fair and above Good they are somewhat easier.

Uppers.—All styles have been dealt in. Prices of spot against contracts are generally a little easier than last week. The grades below Fully Fair are neglected, and can be bought at fairly reasonable parities.

Brown and Pilion.—A moderate business has been done. Prices of spot against contracts are without much change.

A further report for the week ended December 21 states: Since our last report, the futures market has been rather quieter with a somewhat weak undertone. There is no feature of any importance to report this week. After the wide fluctuations our market has lately experienced, it was but natural to expect prices to stabilise for some time at a level which would be considered reasonable under the existing conditions for both seller and buyer. The New York and Liverpool markets have more or less shown the same aspect, and the approaching Christmas and New Year holidays have also contributed to this state of things. The demand from abroad has been moderate, while the arrivals from the interior have continued on a rather free scale, and have weighed somewhat on the market. The total quantity of cotton received from the interior since September 1 last now exceeds 4½ million kantars, and although, owing to the unreliability of native reports it is almost impossible to ascertain with accuracy the quantity held at present up-country, there should now be no doubt that by the end of the season the arrivals will amount to over 6¼ million kantars. The difference between Sakellarides and Ashmouni has been maintained at about the same parity, but December Ashmouni, owing to the fear of dockets, lost its strength and to-day's session closed at about the same price as February, whereas a week ago it was worth about half a dollar more. It goes without saying that had the discount with February been maintained, it would have induced heavy dockets, there being no justification in carrying cotton under such conditions. We do not expect large fluctuations for the time being, but consider it probable that we shall see a renewed activity after the holidays. The week's receipts amount to 288,173 krs., against exports 210,289 krs.; the stock stands at 2,178,298 krs.

Spot.—We have had a rather quieter week at Minet-el-Bassal, and the turnover amounts to about 18,300 B/s of which we estimate 11,100 B/s Sakel, 7,050 B/s Uppers, 100 B/s Brown and Pilion, and 50 B/s White. Demand from abroad continues on moderate lines, which is usually the case with the approach of the Christmas holidays. Both arrivals and exports, though fairly large, are less than last week, and the stock shows a small increase.

Sakellarides.—Business has been done in all styles, and rather more interest has been shown in low grades than for some time past. Prices of spot against contracts are generally without change from last week. The medium qualities still continue to be in most request.

Uppers.—All styles have been dealt in. Prices of spot against contracts are generally a little easier, the grades below Good Fair especially so.

Brown.—A small business has been done at slightly easier parities than last week.

White.—A small business has been done without much change in prices.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended December 29 states :—

This market was, of course, closed on Tuesday and Wednesday for the Christmas holidays, and, as is usual at this season of the year, it cannot be said that the remainder of the week has been seriously devoted to business. There is, therefore, nothing to report under the headings of yarn and cloth. Most firms are also closed for one or two days next week on account of the New Year holiday.

Raw Cotton.—For the same reasons as are mentioned above business has been quiet in Liverpool, but quotations have advanced considerably. Closing prices yesterday were as follows :—American Fully Middling, 21.17d.; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 24.30d.

The production of crude oil by the British Burmah Petroleum Company and the Rangoon Oil Company for November amounted to 58,639 barrels.

A Reuter message from Athens dated December 28 states that the Official Gazette publishes a Decree imposing a tax on business turnovers ranging from 1 to 10 per cent., to become effective as from April 1, 1924.

The Land Bank of Egypt has declared a final dividend of 9s. 6d. per share, making 12s. 6d. for the year, Founders' certificates receiving £6 per centificate. One bonus share of £5 will be issued for every two shares held, while holders of Founders' certificates will receive ten bonus certificates for every one held.

Company Meetings.

IMPERIAL BANK OF PERSIA.

Increase of Business.

The thirty-fourth ordinary general meeting of the Imperial Bank of Persia was held on December 21 at the Cannon Street Hotel, London, E.C. Sir Hugh S. Barnes, K.C.S.I., K.C.V.O. (chairman of the bank), presided.

The Manager and Secretary (Mr. Sydney Rogers) having read the notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors,

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, said: Gentlemen,—I do not think I need delay you very long to-day. The report and accounts we have submitted to you, and which I assume you will take as read, show that we have had another successful year. The figures of the balance-sheet, so far as they differ from those of a year ago, indicate an increase of business. The profit and loss account is almost identical with that of last year, and you will see that we have again been able to announce a final dividend of 6s. a share. There is, therefore, not much room for comment.

Events in Persia, also, so far as the bank is concerned, have been of a more usual and ordinary character during the year under review—that is to say, up to September 20 last—but since that date there has occurred a political development which may have very important consequences. You will remember that when I addressed you last December the Ghaven-es-Saltaneh was still in power as Prime Minister, and it was expected he would hold his position for some time. His tenure of office did not, however, last very long. He resigned in the following February, and a new Cabinet was formed with Mostufi-ul-Mumalik as its head. This gentleman was in turn succeeded in June by Mushir-ed-Dowleh, who had been Premier in the early months of 1922. Throughout these rapid changes of Government, which unfortunately have not been uncommon in Persia, the Sirdar Sepah, the Commander-in-Chief, known to us as Reza Khan, was able to retain his position as Minister of War, and when, in October last, Mushir-ed-Dowleh decided to resign, his Majesty the Shah, who was about to leave for Europe, appointed the Sirdar Sepah to be Prime Minister in his place.

I alluded last year to the success which had attended the Sirdar Sepah's organisation of the army, and to the tranquillity throughout the country which had resulted from his control of the military department. He will now have a far wider sphere for the exercise of his administrative ability, and, though it is unwise for us to indulge in prophecies about Persia, especially at such a distance from the scene, still it does seem possible that with a loyal and popular soldier at the head of the Government, who is also in control of the army, Persia may look forward to a much more stable administration than she has possessed for a very long time.

Much, I expect, will depend upon the support which the new Prime Minister is able to give to the reforms initiated by the American Financial Adviser. It seems to me that the military and financial departments are equally interested in these reforms, for, unless law and order are maintained, no improvement can be hoped for in the collection of revenue, and unless the revenue is largely increased it will be difficult to maintain the army at its present strength. With the army commander at the head of affairs, there is reason to hope that the two departments will heartily co-operate in the task of improving the finances of the country.

So far as we have been able to ascertain, Dr. Millspaugh and his staff have made considerable progress during the past year. Expenditure has been cut down and brought under stricter control; all the sources of revenue have been explored and the methods of collection revised; revenue inspectors have been appointed in most of the provinces, and efforts are being made to bring the assessment of the land revenue up to date. It will be interesting to see whether Dr. Millspaugh is able to balance his budget for the coming year. I have no doubt he will ultimately be able to do so if he is given adequate support and time to permit of the development of his reforms. We have not failed to shoulder our share of responsibility, for the bank has been able to give valuable assistance to the Government in the way of advancing them, on good security, fairly large amounts, repayable at fixed intervals, so as to enable the Financial Department to tide over the difficult period before the reforms come fully into operation.

It has been stated at previous general meetings that the Persian Government has always scrupulously kept their engagements to us, and my experience since I became chairman of the bank enables me to endorse the statement made by my predecessors.

You will probably have noticed that we have opened during the year two new branches in Persia; one, a small branch on the Caspian Sea at Barfrush, which we hope will assist in the reopening of trade with Russia, of which there are indications; and the other at Maidan-i-Naftun—that is to say, at the oilfields of the Anglo-Persian Oil Company. Both these branches were opened at the request of the Financial Adviser, who is anxious to make greater use of our provincial branches as Government treasuries in connection with the collection of revenue.

Another item of interest is that we have obtained rather freer powers outside of Persia by the grant of permission from the Government of India to open branches of the bank in India instead of acting through agents. A corresponding arrangement with the Colonial Office and the Irak Government has enabled us to transform our two agencies in Mesopotamia into branches of the bank.

It is satisfactory to note that the trade of Persia for the year ended in March last has been well maintained. According to the returns received from the Customs Department the total imports for the year amounted to £12,368,228—a slight increase over the previous twelve months. The exports for the year were £14,678,456, a very considerable improvement. The oil exported by the Anglo-Persian Company, of course, figures largely among the exports.

With regard to the balance-sheet, you will, I think, agree that the figures show steady progress and a return to a more normal employment of the bank's funds. You will notice that there are increases in the liabilities of the bank—namely, in the note issue, under deposits, and in bills payable. On the assets side our cash in hand, etc., has fallen to £2,275,000, or £469,000 less than last year, and the amount of our investments is also lower by £306,000. This means, of course, that we have less idle money and that larger amounts are employed in our business. This is also shown by the increase under bills discounted, loans and advances to £2,982,623, an advance of nearly one and a-quarter millions over the figures of last year.

The profit and loss account needs no comment. We have again been able to put £30,000 to the reserve, which now stands at £370,000, and to pay a final dividend of 6s. a share, making altogether 9s. a share for the year, free of tax. This represents a gross return of 11s. 9d. per share, or just over 9 per cent., less tax, on the par value of our shares.

There is one paragraph of our report in regard to which you will probably be glad of some further explanation—namely, that which refers to our decision to close the financial year in future on March 20 instead of September 20. I dare say all of you know that the Mahomedan New Year's Day, the Naurouz, is March 21, and it has always seemed to me a little odd that the financial year of the State Bank of Persia should not coincide with the Persian Government's financial year. The explanation is that our Charter and Deed of Settlement were granted in September, 1889, with the provision that the first general meeting should be held in 1890 and thereafter once in every calendar year. The directors of that day therefore decided to begin from September 20, the Persian half-year, and no change has been made since that time.

Before the war this did not occasion much difficulty, but you will remember that during the war we more than once found it impossible to get our accounts home in time to hold the meeting before the end of the calendar year, and on one occasion our general meeting was actually deferred until the following March. Since the war, owing to the increase of our business and the opening of additional branches both in Persia and also in Basrah, Baghdad, and Bombay, we have again found our staff in Persia and ourselves very hard pressed in the matter of preparing our accounts for audit and completion in time to enable us to hold our meeting before the Christmas holidays.

The advantages of the change we are about to make will be that in future the bank's year will coincide with the Persian financial year; it will also closely correspond with the English financial year, which will simplify the calculation of income-tax, and we shall have plenty of time to get home and complete our accounts and to hold our general meeting some time towards the end of June or beginning of July. I feel sure, therefore, that you will approve of the change and find it convenient.

In conclusion, I feel bound to pay a hearty tribute to our managers and staff, both in Persia and at home, for their loyal work during the year and their unwearied efforts in the interest of the bank. We have decided to grant them the usual bonus of 10 per cent. on their salaries, a decision which I am sure you will approve.

The report was adopted.

COMPANY NOTES AND REPORTS.

Phœnix Oil and Transport.

The directors of the Phœnix Oil and Transport Company, in their report for 1922, state that delay arose this year in the earlier preparation of the accounts largely through the work involved in assuming control of Roumanian Consolidated Oilfields. While at the present time the issued capital of the company is £3,512,235, the actual issued capital at the end of the year 1922, to which the accounts relate, was £1,454,468. Since the report issued after the Chairman's visit to Roumania in June last progress on the company's properties has continued in a satisfactory manner. An extensive drilling programme is being carried out, comprising the drilling of 59 wells, all of which are in proven oil-bearing territory. In the Stavropoleos field 20 wells have been drilled into the oil-sands, or are in course of drilling, and the former have already produced appreciable quantities of oil. In this district eight new wells have been drilled into the oil-sand within the last few months, all of which are in process of cleaning; therefore a large increase in production from these wells may be expected in the near future. In the Moreni-Tuicani district, which is one of the most prolific fields yet developed in Roumania, seven wells are being drilled by the company, one of which is already approaching the oil-sand. From the Tzintea field a large proportion of the present output of the "Orion" Company is derived; 12 new wells are being drilled in this field. In the Runcu district 16 wells are being drilled, several of which are approaching the oil-sand. The production of crude oil in 1922 was 42,106 tons, and has amounted to more than 100,000 tons in 1923. The directors add that this rate should be considerably increased as and when the wells which have entered the oil-sand, and which are in process of cleaning, come into regular production, and when results are obtained from the large drilling programme which the company has in hand.

Among the properties of Roumanian Consolidated Oilfields is a large area of land in the Aricesti district near Ploesti, in which town are situate most of the refineries. Before the control of that company was acquired, the existence of natural gas had been discovered on its property, and the company had obtained a sole concession for the supply of gas to the town of Ploesti, and had also laid a pipeline to convey the gas to that town. By the drilling of deeper wells in the immediate vicinity of this land, sands giving great quantities of gas have now been discovered, and as similar results can be anticipated on the company's property, it has been decided to proceed immediately with the deepening of the wells already commenced and the development of the property, the results of which may be of great importance. The financial position of the Phœnix group is sound, possessing as it does cash and liquid assets approaching £500,000. The directors state that, in view of the results mentioned above, and the anticipated developments indicated, they have no hesitation in expressing their confidence in the future of the undertaking. The profit and loss account shows a total profit of £51,985, and a net profit after providing for all expenses of £39,229, from which is deducted the loss of £11,436 brought in from the previous year, leaving a credit balance of £27,792.

Indo-Burma Oilfields.

The report of the Indo-Burma Oilfields (1920) for the year ended March 31 last states that in view of the outlook on the Yenangyaung oilfield, 60 leasehold well sites on that field have been given up on the unanimous opinion of the company's technical advisers and with the consent of the trustees for the debenture holders. Most of the houses, stores, etc., belonging to the company at Yenangyaung have also been disposed of. A well was sunk to over 2,000 ft., without result, and the policy of withdrawal from this field, besides enabling concentration of work on other more promising properties of the company, effects a large saving in rents payable on these leasehold sites. The oil-bearing areas belonging to the company—all situated in Burma—now total 165.04 square miles. Drilling has proceeded continuously during the period covered by the accounts and up to date. The production for the year ended October 31, 1923, totalled 52,170 barrels, or 8,026 tons. As foreshadowed in the last report, pending a larger production, the output is being sold to the Burmah Oil Company, and the refinery has been closed down. Steps are now being taken to liquidate the Refinery Company, which will have the effect of either enabling this company to recover its large advances or acquiring complete ownership in place of the five-sevenths interest now held in the Refinery Company. During the period under review drilling has been mostly concentrated on increasing the production on the proved areas of Yenanma and Padaukpin. Although several new wells have been brought in approximating to the average yields in these fields, the directors are of opinion that they are not typical of the results that can reasonably be expected from the general indications of these districts. It has therefore been decided to restrict drilling to exploratory work beyond the limits of the producing areas—with a view to striking better yields.

Dacia Romano.

The report of the Dacia Romano Petroleum Syndicate for the year ended March 31, 1923, states that the year's production of crude oil was 5,260.60 tons, an increase of 2,396.60 tons on the yield for the preceding year. This production was obtained from Chiciura well No. 1, Baicoi wells Nos. 1 and 2, and Moreni well No. 1. The latter well, which was damaged by eruption when being brought in, flowed intermittently between the casing for some weeks—yielding 2,130 tons until it choked through a caving in of the casing. After initial difficulties, good progress has recently been made, and it is hoped the well will be again producing in a few weeks. During the year the drilling of Chiciura well No. 2 was continued, and two new wells were commenced—Moreni well No. 2 and Baicoi well No. 3. The refinery has been working only intermittently during the year. The company's production has been insufficient to keep the refinery fully employed, and the price of crude oil rose to a figure which made its purchase a somewhat risky operation. Roumanian exchange has continued to present difficulties, and has fluctuated between 600 lei and 1,100 lei to the £. Capital conversions have been taken at 660 lei, and floating assets and liabilities at the rate ruling at March 31, which was 1,000 lei to the £. The accounts show a loss of £9,535 12s. 11d., which it is proposed to write off from general reserve. The directors have under consideration the depreciation of assets, which has been in abeyance pending production.

National Bank of Egypt.

The position at October 31, published in conformity with Article 8 of the Statutes:—Banking Department: Liabilities.—Share capital, £E2,925,000 (300,000 fully paid shares of £10 each); reserve fund: statutory reserve, £E1,462,500; special reserve, £E731,250; current, deposit, and other accounts, £E10,633,739; mixed tribunals, £E1,329,136; Egyptian Government, £E8,273,848; Sudan Government, £E292,913; bankers' accounts, £E767,711; cheques and bills payable, £E233,379; sundry other accounts, £E930,343—£E27,579,819. NOTES OF THE WEEK.

France and Czecho-Slovakia.

Czecho-Slovakia is entirely within her rights in making a treaty with France, and it is open to her to persuade herself that in so doing she is winning France to peaceful aims, and is not exposing herself to future war risks. The stress laid on the absence of any military convention between the two countries will deceive no one outside Czecho-Slovakia in view of the fact that the Czecho-Slovakian army, trained by French officers and commanded by a French general, is still to "maintain contact" with the French General Staff. Hitherto Czecho-Slovakia has declared herself to be whole-heartedly on the side of peace. Now there are two ways of promoting peace among the nations; one is to discourage armaments, while actively furthering the cause of international righteousness; the other is to remain armed to the teeth in the hope of terrorising every one else from disturbing the peace. The latter course has been proved worthless, for sooner or later the terrorist becomes an intolerable bully, and the nations are forced to compass his undoing; the former course, it was hoped, would be the only one adopted after the Great War. France, however, has willed otherwise, and now that Czecho-Slovakia has definitely thrown in her lot with French policy, she must not expect to rank among the prophets of the new dispensation. The action of the Prague Government would matter little to the Near East, if it were not for the influence that it exercises through the Little Entente on Roumania and Yugoslavia. For reasons that are set forth on another page these two countries, we may hope, will refuse to be drawn into commitments that offer them no compensating advantages.

Roumania's Policy.

Roumania is naturally anxious to regulate her position in regard to Russia. She wishes to have her incorporation of Bessarabia recognised by the Soviet Government, and by treaty or otherwise to feel reasonably secure against a Russian war of revenge. Single-handed she has little to count upon in her negotiations with Russia beyond such Soviet good will as she may be fortunate enough to inspire. As a member of the Little Entente, strengthened possibly by the inclusion of Poland, and linked by some form of ties with France, Roumania might hope to be able to exercise more influence on the Soviet Government. We imagine, however, that if the latter were bent on mischief, it would be at pains to investigate the value of Roumania's big friends. Its first discovery would be that both France and Czecho-Slovakia were exceedingly anxious to cultivate friendly relations with Russia; secondly, it must know that an alliance embracing Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, and Yugoslavia is likely at present to prove rather a half-hearted affair. Russia, therefore, would hardly be likely to accept Roumania's backing at the latter's own valuation, and would not be deterred by it from any course which she had made up her mind to pursue. On the other hand, a Balkan Confederation comprising Roumania, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, and Greece would have an unequivocal foreign policy, based on its territorial integrity, and its influence would be a valuable factor in making the League of Nations a real force in European affairs. It is to hoped, therefore, that in the light of Czecho-Slovakia's new departure Roumania and Yugoslavia will refuse to be drawn, through the Little Entente, into a policy that would render still more difficult the establishment of permanent peace in the Balkan Peninsula.

M. Venizelos in Greece.

M. Venizelos has arrived in Greece, and has lost no time in grappling with the task before him. The resignation of the Revolutionary Committee and the disbandment of the Military League have left him a free field in the matter of undivided authority; but it would seem as if the elimination of the autocratic power of the Committee had served only to encourage the extremists on both the Republican and the Royalist side. The work that M. Venizelos has set himself to do is to bring about reconciliation between the two parties, and, as far as published reports indicate his point of view, it is that a solution can be reached by holding the balance even between the contending factions, so as to allow numerical superiority to decide the issue. There is little in the recent history of Greece to suggest that this method will be successful. In the opinion of the Royalists, the scales have already been weighted against them in the execution of M. Gounaris and his fellow-Ministers and in the exile of King George II., and if they are to have a fair chance, they expect the balance to be redressed at least to the extent of the recall of the King. The Republicans, on the other hand, are elated with the measure of success that they have already obtained—the banishment of the King, the open advocacy of a Republic by Colonel Plastiras, and the theoretical support of M. Venizelos himself. They will, therefore, look to M. Venizelos to have the courage of his convictions and to bring about a Republican system of government.

A Definite Lead?

So far the indications are that M. Venizelos will try to avoid heroic measures. He will endeavour to hold a strictly impartial plebiscite, and will be guided by the result. The danger of this negative attitude will be that it may leave Greece, if M. Venizelos carries out his intention of an early withdrawal, without any recognised leader, with the Republicans acting on the threat already made—that they will not recognise a verdict in favour of the Monarchy. Although only contradictory reports of the result of the recent General Election in its bearing on the constitutional status of Greece have reached the outside world, it must be possible for the Greek authorities themselves, after taking into consideration the fact that the Royalists absented themselves from the polling, to form a clear idea as to whether Greek public opinion favours a Republic or a Monarchy. If the latter, it would seem to be unfortunate that M. Venizelos does not come boldly out on the side of the Monarchy, and thus take the one step which would go far at this stage towards healing the breach between anti-Venizelists and Venizelists. Under his leadership or advisership the two parties could come together for the definite purpose of saving the Monarchy. The identification of the Republicans with the military junta that has held power for the last fifteen months would simplify Greek politics, which would henceforth turn on a broad constitutional principle instead of on personalities.

M. Venizelos's Illness.

Much sympathy will be felt with M. Venizelos that at the moment when it is most essential that he should not relax his grip upon things he has been overtaken by serious indisposition, which keeps him confined to his bed for a few days. During the proceedings in the Chamber, when he was being elected President by 345 votes out of 385, he had a heart attack, and had to be conveyed to his house. Fortunately, the latest reports are reassuring, and it is just possible that the sudden illness may make its appeal to party passion and help to smooth the way for M. Venizelos's task. He has wisely insisted on his party's electing someone else as leader; for it is essential, if Greece is to be able to manage her own affairs, that she should have people at the helm accustomed to lead, in the event of M. Venizelos's leaving the country. If the Liberals could select as their leader a man who has not been identified with extreme partisanship, the appointment might prove an important factor in the restoration of unity in Greece.

Turkey's Problems.

Credit is certainly due somewhere in Turkey for the acquittal of the three Constantinople editors charged with high treason. Whether it should be given exclusively to the Tribunal of Independence, or is to be shared by the Angora Government for allowing the Tribunal to show its own independence, is not at the moment clear. In any case, it may be taken as a sign of grace in the new Turkey that a concession has been made to abstract justice. The tribunal condemned Lutfi Fikri Bey, whose offence was covered by an ad hoc addition to the penal code; but it shrank from the more flagrant miscarriage of justice that the condemnation of the editors would have entailed. Angora, it is to be hoped, will recognise that their acquittal knocks the bottom out of some, at least, of its fears. Coinciding, as it does, with the announcement of a serious deficit in the Turkish Budget, the incident should have the effect of suggesting to the Turkish authorities that attention could more profitably be paid to administrative matters than to hunting for mares' nests in Constantinople. The republican régime will be judged by what it accomplishes, and not by what Angora claims for it. So far it has not been able to convince Constantinople that it carries with it any advantages; but it has been proved to entail an absolute travesty of parliamentary government, for the present committee rule in Angora places the caucus of the Popular Party above challenge. The Turks in Turkey's European territory are no less keen than those of Anatolia in preserving the independence of the new State. Their outlook, however, is inevitably wider than that of the Anatolian peasant, and Turkey can prosper only if some consideration is shown to their point of view.

Macedonia.

Speaking on the subject of the Bulgarian Prime Minister's recent references to Macedonia, the Yugoslav Minister for Foreign Affairs has repudiated as contrary to the Treaty of Neuilly and to the facts the statement that there are Bulgarian minorities on Yugoslav territory. Macedonia, he added, could no longer be regarded as an apple of discord. That portion which had been given to Yugoslavia in the Treaty was definitely hers. It was not even Macedonia, but Southern Serbia. If these remarks constitute the official Yugoslav reply to the Bulgarian Prime Minister after consultation with the Yugoslav Minister in Sofia, they may be regarded as a fitting ending to a storm in a teacup. As a contribution to a Balkan settlement they are perhaps less satisfactory. No doubt the portion of Macedonia given to Yugoslavia by treaty is for the time being Yugoslav; but if the Yugoslav Government cannot keep its nationals within its own borders, and if a section of these nationals cross over to a neighbouring country complaining loudly of the ill-treatment and persecution from which they have escaped, then assuredly Macedonia becomes an apple of discord of Yugoslavia's own creation. The remedy lies in the hands of the Yugoslav Government, namely, to make "Southern Serbia" as contented as Northern Serbia, when in all probability it will cease to regard itself as "Macedonia." It is true that successive Bulgarian Governments cannot be regarded as altogether blameless in respect of Macedonia; but the time has come to eradicate this cancer from the Balkans. It can be done by facing facts and exercising good will; it will never be done by quibbling or by trusting to brute force.

The Janina Murders.

The publication (unauthorised) of the reports of the Inter-Allied Control Commission in Epirus on the Janina murders revives a sorry episode in European history, and no good, it is to be feared, can be done by reverting to the subject. No country or body of people in any way connected with that episode ought to be able to reflect upon it without a sense of shame. For Italy, Greece, Albania, and the Conference of Ambassadors it constitutes a grave blot on their respective escutcheons; the Commission of Investigation may have worked conscientiously, but it produced a report without any claims to being a judicial document. The only proper verdict that the Conference of Ambassadors could have given as the result of the Commission's report was that of "Non Proven," and it might have been justified in mulcting Greece in a fine for her technical responsibility. The Conference, however, elected to award Italy the whole of the fifty million lire deposited by Greece, with implicit belief in the Ambassadors' sense of justice. The latter's wrongdoing has robbed them of the right to ask Greece and Albania to take note of the equivocal actions of their officials with a view to the avoidance of frontier incidents in the future.

The "Freedom" of India.

Reports of the proceedings at the Indian National Conference—in other words, the extremist caucus—throw little fresh light on the political situation. The cleavage on religious lines seems to have been accentuated rather than alleviated, while the more academic discussions on "freedom" and "independence" suffered from the lack of precise definition of terms which characterise such gatherings in other countries besides India. Taking, however, the rhetoric at its face value, and applying it to the facts of the day, the claim seems to be that each active minority should be free to impose its will, or its whims, on the country as a whole, and, provided that so much freedom is enjoyed, the status of India in regard to the rest of the Empire becomes comparatively unimportant. What is to happen when active minorities clash has not yet been made plain. There is, for instance, an active minority in favour of throwing pork into mosques, and another which throws beef into temples: judging from the recent rhetoric both of them are entitled to claim freedom, provided that they are reasonably persistent and enthusiastic; but hitherto logic has given way at this point, and the police have been called in. The only practical result of such discussions must be to show the distance which has still to be traversed before there can be an effective expression of the Indian national will.

The Emergence of the Group System.

Perhaps the most definite feature of the last three years of Indian political life is the failure of the attempt to establish large parties on the English model, and, at any rate for some time to come, it will be necessary to think in terms of the Continental system of groups, forming temporary agglomerations in response to fluctuating currents of opinion. We are not convinced that this result is wholly a matter for regret. The party system has the advantage of getting work done, but it is done at the expense of a good deal of make-believe, while what India lacks most of all is a clearer grasp of realities. The gradations of opinion are, in fact, very numerous, and it is by no means unreasonable to hope that small groups, each of them at the outset holding firmly to its own narrow view, may gradually integrate into a few large units as the need for co-operation is learned by hard experience. The so-called parties of the last three years have begun to disintegrate almost as soon as formed, and an acute Indian observer already detects nine groups among the extremists, who boast in public of their unanimity. They are, in fact, not a party, but a rather unstable bloc, and while there are some questions on which they will hold together, the cracks are rather more likely to widen than to close.

The Nepal Treaty.

Following the recent and praiseworthy practice, the India Office has been quick to circulate the text of the treaty signed at the end of last month with the Maharajadhiraja of Nepal. In themselves the terms of the treaty are not of much public interest, the main features being arrangements for importing arms under due safeguards and for exempting from Customs duties goods for Nepal which reach India by sea, but the mere fact that such amicable arrangements are possible, and the cordiality of the messages exchanged on their completion, indicate that the century-old friendship between the two countries continues to increase. There is not too much good will between neighbours in Asia just now, and the hope expressed by the Maharajadhiraja that the existing relations may become as everlasting as the mighty Himalayas presents an ideal of international stability which may be commended to the attention of the continent as a whole, and to some of India's other neighbours in particular.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

The Farce of Fusion.

The intrigues which one prophesied as a result of the defeat of Protection and of the consequent approaching of the Labour Party to power have fallen about us "thick and fast." First, the anti-Labour stalwarts pleaded for a Coalition of Conservatives and Liberals against the Socialists, but, finding that idea still too offensive for the ordinary man's sight, they have clothed it in yet more shiny rags and called it "Fusion."

This scheme, designed to abolish the three-party system, has been cleverly engineered, but not cleverly enough to deceive the public, who are not in the least inclined to disallow Labour the chance of showing what a mess a new party may make of things. They are, in fact, convinced not only that it would be disastrous by trickery to check the advent of Labour, but also that it would be a monstrously unsporting thing to do. And in no sense will they permit their conception of the rules of the political game to be overridden.

It is true that in certain quarters both of influence and of affluence the determination of the Liberals to let Labour have a fling has had a depressing effect, but that will probably right itself when it is seen how thin are the fears that Mr. Ramsay MacDonald might plunge the country into ruin.

A shrewd judge told me the other day that the only visible result which the Labour Party's indulgence in office will have had on this country will be the worsening of relations with France. Certainly their party leaders are being exceedingly circumspect in their recitals of what they intend to do.

The Corpse of Reunion.

The controversy which, in default of more intimate subjects, has been raging round the question of the reunion of the Christian Churches has now almost ceased, and, indeed, but for the fact that the Press was extremely hard up for material, would never have been so extensively begun. The idea of reunion is now a corpse; or perhaps it is better to say that it was born dead. And there has been little grief manifested at its funeral.

After all, one says, we live in a world in which all sorts of discords have for practical purposes to be resolved. Chromatic harmonies which to our forefathers would have seemed the end of all things are now freely permitted, and the whole trend of affairs is for some to advance and some to stagnate, and away from unity and uniformity.

It is with some such comforting generalisation that the people of this country have shelved or buried the cause of reunion.

Another Illusion Shattered.

Life nowadays is just one sharp shock after another. No sooner had we dissolved our dismay upon learning that Mr. Lloyd George did not come back from America with a policy of Protection seething somewhere inside his cerebral geyser, than we learned that the English people do not care two straws about the visible unity of their faith, and now, cruellest of all, we are told by Sir Richard Gregory, who knows more about the subject than anyone else, that there is no evidence of progressive change in our national weather! This really is too affecting; our parents will have to find other falsehoods than the story of finer summers, colder winters, snowier Christmases, and so on, to beguile their disillusioned offspring.

How British people will proceed now under the handicap of being unable to say that the weather always used to be better than it is to-day one cannot imagine. It pricks us to the heart to be told that in the last 109 years the temperature at Christmas has only three times fallen below freezing point, and that since 1810 snow has fallen in London on Christmas Eve but twice. For these facts inclusively damn not only our fathers, but our grandfathers; and one wonders whether their sins will be visited on the third generation.

People and Music.

The present month is one of conferences, educational as well as political. Now it is possible to hear lectures which are often dull but sometimes interesting and informative. Into the second category one may always put anything Sir Hugh Allen likes to say upon music; he has just been telling the Incorporated Society of Musicians what he thinks of them, and his remarks apply universally.

He divides musical people into the people who really know, people who think they do and do not, and people who think they do not but do—in other words, the expert, the "superior" person, and the man in the street. Personally, I think Sir Hugh is over-generous; I have certainly heard more dogmatism (of course, prefaced by pretensions to ignorance) upon music indulged in by the man in the street than by anyone else. In music, more even than in pictorial art, the ordinary man "knows what he likes," and that may be Mozart or Delius, but it is more likely to be Puccini or Amy Woodford-Finden.

However, music is not a matter of knowledge, and de gustibus . . . .

"Drummond's."

It was the fashion before the War to deride Marx's theory of the inevitability under the capitalist system of big trusts and combines, but the War in this country at least certainly seems to have caused a remarkable concentration of capital or of property in a few hands. We had the railways, we had the newspapers, and now we have almost a final example of the banks. The banking combines are perhaps the most notable feature in the financial history of Great Britain.

"Drummond's," one of the three remaining private banks which has just been absorbed by the Royal Bank of Scotland, has a most romantic history, its founder being responsible for the funds of the Jacobites. It is famous even in the last act of its career of 200 years, for this amalgamation provides the first instance of a Scottish institution acquiring an English banking business, and, also, it will entail the creation of the first Scotch bank with a business in the West End.

But we can endure this economic penetration if the Scots do not beat us at Twickenham in March!

The Death of a Victorian.

The frequency with which one reads the obituaries of men eminent in Victorian times reminds one how near to and yet how far away we are from that era, and no death so typifies that gap as that of Mr. Baring-Gould, who was a famous author, hymn-writer, squire, and rector.

Few people can but have heard of him in some connection or other; they had sung his hymns, they had studied his own studies in folk-lore, particularly his resurrection of West Country songs, some, even, had read his novels. He was a man of great and demonstrable energy, such as we do not often see to-day; the products of his labours were immense and varied—he wrote on subjects as remote as "Iceland" and as intimate as "Onward, Christian Soldiers." Of all this huge "output" it is perhaps not too risky to say that his researches into West Country antiquities and lore have the best chance of surviving.

A Labour View of History.

On Saturday a debate took place at the London School of Economics—an institution which specialises brilliantly in dull and futile subjects—upon "Is There a Labour View of History?" The question, to the ordinary intelligence, answers itself. Since "Labour" is the product of one of the later phases of Capitalism, its view upon earlier periods of history cannot very well be presented. If all that was meant by the earnest amiables who expounded this matter was "A People's View of History," then, of course, they were indulging in superfluous harangue, for many people, from Green to Chesterton, have attempted to write history from the people's point of view.

But how naïve these Labour people are! To proclaim one's bias before one writes anything is scarcely the way to persuade readers that one is out after the truth: it was this fault that provoked, for instance, the present reaction against the assumption that the younger Pitt was a great Foreign Minister and Castlereagh a poor one. And in any case, a good history from a Tory point of view is due before the advent of a Labour one.

Church and Stage.

At the present time a striking reconciliation is going on between Church and Stage. The connection between Worship and the Drama is, of course, a commonplace, but there is abroad a really earnest endeavour to realise it. Much of the enthusiasm behind the movement known as the League of Arts came from clergymen, and most of the modern pageants are ecclesiastical in origin. I saw one a week or so ago very beautifully staged by the St. Martin's Church, Trafalgar Square, people, and during this week a "Mystery" play actually is to be performed every night in St. Edward's Church at Holbeck, in Leeds.

There are still people who are shocked by dramatic presentation in churches, but they are decreasing in number. After all, the severance of Church and Stage was in England the work of a minority, and the product of what is now recognised as a very narrow interpretation of Christianity. There are indeed plays, most lovely and moving things (such as "Everyman"), which are most fitly played in a church, and this experiment at Leeds should be closely watched to see how the temper of our time is changing.

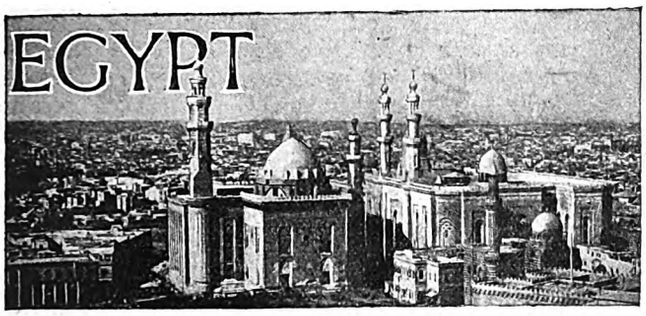
The Near and Middle East.*

From Our Own Correspondents.



Cairo, December 23.

Sheikh Shawish.

The only political incident of much interest during the past week has been the reported return of the turbulent Sheikh Abdel Aziz Shawish. Sent out of the country shortly before the War by the ex-Khedive, Sheikh Shawish has never since returned. The Angora Government, by which he has been employed during recent months, seems to have tired of him, for Shawish has lately been endeavouring to obtain a passport to Egypt, but without success, the view of the Egyptian Government having been that Shawish was too disturbing a character to allow back in the country at election time, even though he had been adopted as Nationalist candidate for the Gumrouk constituency of Alexandria. Shawish and the Nationalists have both protested much at the prohibition, but without any effect on the Government's decision. Then suddenly two Arabic newspapers receive letters, posted in Cairo, from the Sheikh and publish them with the comment that they have convincing proofs that the writer has managed to return to this country, despite the Government's opposition. The return of the wanderer was at first accepted as an accomplished fact, but now that searches by both enemies and friends have quite failed to find the Sheikh, or any trace of how he got into the country, the opinion is growing that his letter to the newspapers must have been written outside Egypt and posted by an agent here, and that the whole incident has been simply a ballon d'essai to see how the authorities would act if the Sheikh did suddenly turn up in Egypt. The real truth of the matter will doubtless appear in the near future. pending which it is safe to say that if Shawish is not already here, his return has not been hastened by his latest escapade.

Christmas Arrangements.

Our first touch of really cold weather has come this morning. A bitingly cold wind, carrying with it dust and sand, a sort of winter khamsin, makes some people talk of seasonable weather and others curse the reputedly wonderful Egyptian winter climate, comparing it unfavourably with winter in England. More than ever, this year, the favourite plan seems to be to go away somewhere for Christmas. At Mena House Hotel the atmosphere seems to be full of cotton, so large is the invasion of Alexandrian merchant princes. On the other hand, every Cairene who can possibly do so seems to be leaving for Luxor or Assouan this evening. Christmas in this country is, for the majority of the British community, at any rate, a feast that is kept chiefly in hotels. Each year less and less private entertaining seems to be done, and more and more are Shepheard's, the Continental-Savoy, and Mena House the goals of everyone in festive mood. Christmas in a Cairo hotel can certainly be amusing, but it bears little relation to traditional celebrations of December 25.

British Disunion.

While so many Alexandrians are content to come to Cairo for their Christmas amusement, very few, it seems, are willing to take Cairo's lead when it comes to matters of more serious interest to the British community in this country. The failure of the British Union, a body which happens to have been originated in Cairo, to establish a branch in Alexandria, owing to the organised opposition at the meeting recently held there by the Union, was reported in an earlier letter. At that meeting a proposal was carried that the Alexandria branch of the British Chamber of Commerce should, by amending its statutes, take over in Alexandria the kind of work for which the establishment of a branch of the British Union had been proposed. The Chamber of Commerce, however, after thinking the matter over, declined the suggested extension of its activities. This notwithstanding, the Alexandria die-hards, rather than join a body like the British Union, whose headquarters are in Cairo, are holding another meeting at the end of this week, with the object of forming another and entirely new organisation, to be charged with the defence of the interests of Alexandrian British subjects only. If the new organisation is formed, British interests here will have received a bad blow, for the British Union, only now entering upon a life of full effectiveness, because hitherto its membership has been small, and the authorities have been cool, will no longer be able to speak for the whole of the British community, and will consequently lose some of its authority and utility. Recent happenings have shown so clearly the necessity—the quickly growing necessity—for foreign communities in this country to organise for their own protection, that it is hard to understand how the idea of weakening the British Union by lessening its mandate can ever have been seriously put forward.

Railway Contracts.

Recently I referred to public uneasiness regarding the railways as a consequence of the departure of the late General Manager and the facts which came to light at the time. Frequent new reports of friction between senior officials, and trouble of one kind and another have not tended to reduce the suspicion that the railways are not being run with efficiency as the sole object in view. When the General Manager of the railways had entire control of the system, nobody outside the railways could do very much harm. But now that the General Manager has been shorn of most of his powers it is quite another story. Technical officials of long experience are constantly being overridden on technical matters. All important decisions are now taken by the Ministry, and, in consequence, all manner of important projects are being hung up awaiting a decision. One of the latest consequences of the Ministry's monopolisation of everything has resulted in the local representatives of twenty-seven firms who unsuccessfully tendered for the supply of thirty locomotives holding a meeting in Cairo, at which they decided to ask the local diplomatic representatives of their various countries to take action in connection with the manner in which the adjudication was carried out. After the tenders had been received by the Ministry, two firms out of the twenty-eight were selected and were asked to put in new offers, as their bids were too high. Eventually the tender was given to one of the two firms, an Italian concern, which lowered its price per locomotive, compared with the tender put in, by £E500. The twenty-seven other firms are up in arms against this new method of conducting an adjudication.

Cairo, December 30.

Taking Stock.

Egypt faces the beginning of a New Year with much more confidence and hope than even the most optimistic could summon up twelve months ago. The outstanding features of 1923 for Egypt have, of course, been political. The promulgation of a Constitution, the abolition of martial law, the release of political prisoners, the beginning of Egypt's first Parliamentary elections, and the settling of the difficult question of compensation for retiring foreign officials, are achievements which overshadow everything else. But not only in the political world has progress been made.

Business is now on a much sounder footing than it was a year ago. The slow but sure return of prosperity has been attested during the past few weeks by the huge volume of Christmas business and by the evidences on every hand that there is now much more money available for luxuries than at the beginning of the year now ending. The cotton crop has been good, and prices are at a remunerative level; the Nile has been exceptionally high, and ample water has been available throughout the year for the irrigation of secondary crops, all of which promise well. The favourable trade balance, which was the outstanding feature of 1922's trade returns, after several unfavourable years, has been greatly increased during this year, while figures for both imports and exports are many millions ahead of those of twelve months ago. The last financial year ended with a surplus of over five million pounds, and there are prospects of as good a result next March. The difficult transition period resulting from recent political changes is being surmounted, not without difficulties and set-backs, but certainly with less general upheaval than the pessimists anticipated.

In the social world there is a forward movement led by the women, who are rapidly coming into their own, and to whom the credit for the recent minimum marriage age law is chiefly due. Altogether, Egypt, taking stock at the beginning of 1924, can feel quite satisfied with the progress, substantial if not showy, accomplished in 1923.

Alexandria v. Cairo.

The interests and influence of the British community in Egypt received a hard blow on Thursday afternoon when a meeting in Alexandria decided to form an organisation for the defence of British interests other than commercial in that city, which will work independently of, and in rivalry with, the British Union in Egypt. As mentioned in my last letter, this meeting was the outcome of the attempt by the Union to establish an Alexandrian branch. The Alexandria members of the British Chamber of Commerce, jealous of their position, packed the Union's meeting with their friends, and by trotting out the old grumble about Cairo dictating to Alexandria, succeeded in getting passed a resolution declaring the Union unnecessary in Alexandria. The next idea was for the Chamber of Commerce to extend its scope by including interests other than commercial within its province. This failed largely owing to the unstinted abuse which the Chamber received in the correspondence columns of the Egyptian Gazette, the letters published by that journal making it quite clear that the British public in Egypt is so dissatisfied with what the Chamber has been able to accomplish in commerce as to distrust whole-heartedly any political efforts it might make. So this new third body has been formed, and the cause of British unity in Egypt, for which enthusiasts in Cairo and Alexandria have been working for the last four years, has received a crippling defeat. The result is not altogether surprising, in view of the ridiculous, but none the less real, jealousy existing between the British colonies of the two cities. In Cairo every Alexandrian is considered to be a purse-proud "cotton king," while the British community of Alexandria regards every Cairo Briton as an extremely snobbish Government official. What is astonishing is that the Alexandria meeting decided to limit the new body's activities to Alexandria. The logical development of this principle will be the formation in Suez, Port Said, Mansura, and every other town or village where two or three Britons are gathered together of British councils, all working against each other, and none of them able alone to accomplish anything. It would have been better if the Alexandrians had decided to form a body to contest the Union throughout Egypt. Then we should have had a fight to the death, and the victor would have remained, badly knocked about, but still representative of the whole British community. Such a struggle must come sooner or later. The only result of the Alexandria meeting so far has been to reduce the effectiveness of the British Union by at least 50 per cent., and to gather to the new body 5 per cent. at the outside of the authority which the Union has lost. So for the average Briton in Egypt the net result is that he now stands only 55 per cent. as good a chance of getting his wrongs righted as he did a week ago. When the two organisations settle down in earnest to tearing each other to pieces—for the British Union, I hear, has no intention of abdicating the position it has already secured in Alexandria—each will part with another three-quarters of its authority in the eyes of both the Residency and the Egyptian Government, and then the plain man with a grievance will be wasting his time in appealing to either. So the mutual destruction will go on until the British communities of both Alexandria and Cairo realise that either there must be one organisation representative of the whole British community in Egypt, or else every town must have its British union, or council, or whatever it may be called, and all these bodies must have a common supreme council, or convention. There is only one way of protecting British interests here, and that is by the whole British community speaking with a single voice.

Tours and Excursions.

The High Commissioner starts to-morrow week on his Sudan tour, and will not be back in Cairo before the end of February. Now it is announced that King Fuad will shortly set out for a visit to the Canal area, and committees have been prepared to give him a welcome in Port Said, Suez, and Ismailia. At the last-named town His Majesty will be the guest of Count de Serionne, Agent-General of the Suez Canal Company. Arrangements for the visit are not yet complete, and I understand that it has not yet been decided whether the Royal yacht "Mahroussa" shall make one of her rare sallies from Alexandria harbour to carry the Royal party. In April King Fuad will pay a visit to Rome.

The Prince's Manifesto.

Twice during the past three years groups of Egyptian princes have issued appeals to the Egyptian nation to be calm and steadfast, and this week another such manifesto has been published. In this instance, however, the document cannot quite accurately be termed a Princes' Appeal, for only two or three of the twelve signatories are entitled to be called princes, the remainder being Nabils, the new title invented last year.

Egypt's Ambassadors.

All Egypt's diplomatic representatives abroad have now left to take up their appointments, Seifullah Pasha Yousry and Ahmed Pasha Ziwar having sailed for Washington and Rome respectively in the middle of the month, while Mahmoud Pasha Fakhry and Aziz Pasha Izzet have gone this week to Paris and Rome. Both the two last named, before departing, entertained to dinner representatives of the local communities of the nations to which they have been accredited. Izzet Pasha's dinner to the British community at the Semiramis Hotel on Wednesday evening was a particularly bright affair, at which the High Commissioner and Viscountess Allenby were the guests of honour.

The Elections.

Very soon after this letter is published the final stage of the Chamber of Deputies elections will be upon us, January 12 having been fixed for the polling. The election campaign continues to proceed in a very casual manner, the various parties holding occasional meetings, chiefly in the provinces, but none of them seeming to exert themselves overmuch. The Zaghloulists feel confident of securing a sweeping majority, and, although the Liberal Constitutionals have certainly strengthened themselves during the last few weeks, the followers of the Wafd would appear to have very good grounds for their hopes. In some constituencies there may be surprises, but a big Zaghloulist majority in the new Parliament seems assured. It remains to be seen whether the Nationalists and Liberal Constitutionals will secure sufficient seats to constitute, between them, a minority which will have to be taken into account.

The Treason Trials.

The Tribunal of Independence and its doings are still occupying men's minds to the exclusion of everything else. One trial—that of Lutfi Fikri Bey, President of the Constantinople Bar—has finished with the condemnation of the accused to five years' hard labour. The offence was that of writing in the Tanin a letter to the Khalif recommending him not to yield tamely to certain unofficial propaganda which had begun to be published in the Press concerning his possible impending retirement from his sacred office. Lutfi Fikri Bey had further followed up this action by a letter to the Aksham on November 15 in which he declared that he was an adherent of the Constitutional régime. Apparently in the new Turkish Republic the term constitutional is not synonymous with republican, for the writer of the letter has been given penal servitude for being a constitutionalist. The proceedings at the trial afforded ample evidence that the law of high treason is a blot upon any statute book, for it is so worded that with an interested judiciary it can be so twisted as to appear to justify the most arbitrary acts of injustice.

There are two more trials, one of them proceeding and the other about to begin. The verdict in the case against the editors is expected to-day or to-morrow. It is impossible to form the slightest idea of what the verdict is likely to be, for the conduct of the prosecution has been just as puerile as in the case of Lutfi Fikri Bey. As in that case, the decision will have not the slightest bearing upon the evidence, but will merely serve as an index of the feeling of Angora concerning the effect produced by the condemnation of Lutfi Fikri. If the powers that be feel that it is necessary to placate the body of opinion that is behind the members of the Assembly who tried to put through a motion to subject the verdicts of the tribunal to the ratification of the Assembly, the editors will get off lightly, or perhaps scot free. If, on the other hand, they think that they have more to gain by sitting on the safety valve than by letting off steam, Hussein Djahid will be harshly treated. His humiliation is the sole purpose of the elaborate stage trial; the other editors are merely roped in to obscure the political and personal aspect. The illogicality of the whole business is manifest when one realises that the editor of the Aksham, who published Lutfi Fikri's nefarious letter, which has cost the latter five years' hard labour, has not been called to account at all.

The third trial—that of the Khalif's aide-de-camp, together with several Kurds who are leaders of the port stevedores and boatmen, plus a Communist or two—has not yet begun.

Cabinet Differences.

As a result of these alarums, which themselves reveal a state of chronic nervousness, rumours of changes in the Cabinet are becoming more substantial and precise. The Anatolian Railway quarrel is, like the poor, always with us, and appears to be no nearer solution than it was two months ago. It is being borne in upon the minds of the most fervent partisans of irredentism in the Turkish railway world that no financial Prince Charming is likely to materialise and bedeck the railway with gold. That, however, does not prevent them from continuing their insistent clamour that the railway must be bought by the Government. The next tactical move is the resignation of the Minister of Finance, with whose action the Minister of Public Works is said to be associated. Together with this, the papers are full of a series of estimates of the Budget deficit, which vary from forty to fifty-three millions of pounds Turkish.

The Holiday Season.

The celebration of Christmas and the New Year by the local foreign colonies was cheery, notwithstanding Prohibition and a series of appalling blizzards which seriously upset sea and land communications. The favourite haunts of Tokatlian's and Maxim's were crowded both on Christmas and New Year's Eve, and nobody appeared to be oppressed unduly by the political and financial crisis. The various social and sport institutions of the British Colony are flourishing; the football club is carrying through a long list of fixtures with varying success; a mixed hockey club has been started; the golf club claims a large number of loyal enthusiasts; the Constantinople Club is running a successful billiard handicap, and a social entertainment committee is dangling before our eyes an attractive programme of indoor amusements. On the whole we might be very much worse off than we are.

PERSIA.

Teheran, December 12.

The Japanese Mission.

The members of the above Mission, which is headed by the Japanese Consul General at Calcutta, were yesterday received by the Prime Minister, and this morning had an audience of the Crown Prince. It appears that their Mission is political as well as commercial, and that the Japanese Government intends shortly to establish a Consulate, if not a Legation, here.

Railways.

The papers reported a few days ago that the Ministry of Public Works is preparing a project for submission to the Council of Ministers with regard to the construction of railways in Persia. The Prime Minister sees the great importance attaching to this question, to which he is said to be devoting much attention. The projected line from the Mesopotamian frontier at Khanikin, to which the railway from Baghdad runs, was fully surveyed by the British engineers of the Persian Railway Syndicate at the time of the signature of the Anglo-Persian Agreement of 1919, but on the non-ratification of the agreement by the Mejliss the matter was dropped, and nothing has since been done in the matter. Railways seem to be a necessity for the economic development of the country, and it is to be hoped that the matter will be taken up seriously by the present Government.

The Prosperity of the Country.

A few days ago a large reception was given here by the Union of Merchants in honour of the new Premier at the house of Haji Moin ut Tujjar, one of the leading merchants, who was recently granted the concession for the exploitation of the oilfields in one of the Northern Provinces. A triumphal arch was erected at the entrance of the side street leading to the house, the approaches to which were richly decorated with carpets and rugs, in true Persian style. In reply to the speech of welcome, the Prime Minister, after expressing his satisfaction at the optimism of the merchants and public in general with regard to the improvements which he intends to bring about, and thanking them for their appreciation of his efforts, goes on to say that he fully shares their optimism as to the future prosperity and glory of the country, and he hopes that by his untiring efforts, supported by the nation at large, he may ensure happy and prosperous days for his fellow-countrymen, and that Persia may, in view of the security prevailing throughout the Empire, shortly start on the high-road to progress and to improvement of the economic situation.

PARABLES AND PROVERBS FROM PALESTINE.

"A PALESTINE NOTEBOOK, 1918-1923." By C. R. Ashbee. (London: William Heinemann. 12s. 6d. net.)

The author of this tour de force—combining within the covers both art and craft—was invited to Palestine by the Military Administration in 1918 to report upon the arts and crafts of the country, and to help in the new plans for the "reconstruction" of the City of Jesusalem. He stayed on as Civic Adviser, and in that capacity had ample opportunity to indulge in his hobby of "trying to find out what it all means." His musings and deductions are expressed for the most part in parable form, put into the mouth of one or other of his composite interlocutors, "an intrepid Zionist, an intelligent Moslem, an impartial British official, a Greek aristocrat, and an impertinent free lance." To the dramatis personæ must be added the author himself, and between the six of them the reader is treated to a candid criticism of Palestine from within with a few pen-pictures not always flattering to the "subject." If, as may be imagined, the author's epigrams and caustic remarks occasionally escaped him as winged words and were not always confined to the secrecy of his note-book, the failure of the Jerusalem Drainage Scheme, which was responsible for Mr. Ashbee's sudden departure from Palestine, may, in the opinion of some of those whom he left behind, not have been without its compensations. Whether, after the appearance of this volume, they or the author will laugh last we have no means of knowing.

It would be quite unfair to a book which is both instructive and amusing to suggest that it will be read only for its lighter parts. Mr. Ashbee may in places overdo his historical allusions, but where he does not allow his professional instinct to assert itself above the cynic we have a telling passage such as his interpretation of the Dome of the Rock. Or, again, there is sound shrewdness in the Sheikh's "profound suspicion of our quasi-democratic legislation." It may be better, writes Mr. Ashbee, to avoid sham democracy.

> Character cannot be formed except through its own traditional environment. As for Palestine, no democracy is possible there for a long time to come. It would commit felo de se immediately. For democracy you must have solidarity of tradition. You can get it among the Jews, you can get it among the Arabs, you can get it even among the Christians; but you cannot as yet get it in a community composed of all three. After long ages it may come—such a period of gestation as the Roman Empire provided in Palestine between the days of Mark Antony and those of Heraclius, when Palestine capitulated to the new power that stood for democracy—Islam the leveller.

In a final chapter the author undertakes to place before the reader "what he really thinks," and leads us on to his conception of a new civic consciousness as the hope of civilisation. There we may take leave of him, realising that we have been regaled with an intellectual treat, artistically served by a master hand.

AN EMPIRE-BUILDER.

"SIR BARTLE FRERE: A FOOTNOTE TO THE HISTORY OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE." By W. Basil Worsfold. (London: Thornton Butterworth, 25s.)

Mr. Worsfold's account of Sir Bartle Frere is one of the outstanding biographies of recent years, and it is certainly something more than is indicated modestly by its sub-title, "A Footnote to the History of the British Empire." Frere occupies an almost unique position in the long list of British pro-consuls, because as a man of vision and initiative he worked for a policy that subsequent statesmen, in the widest sense of the word, have been more fortunate in carrying out. Frere's personality, as presented by Mr. Worsfold, is entirely attractive, and, whatever conclusion the reader may adopt as to the political wisdom of some of his actions, it cannot be denied that he was right in his views, though wrong in his methods. Unfortunately, only those whom the gods favour can afford to flout the powers that be, and Frere, with his intimate knowledge of South African conditions, was the last man to be overridden in a course which he considered to be right.

His record as an Empire-builder begins in India, where he had reached the high office of Governor of Bombay before he was sent to South Africa at one of the most difficult and most stormy periods of its history. In India he performed solid and notable service. When the Mutiny broke out he was Commissioner of Sind, and at once, stretching his authority, he despatched a large portion of the troops in that province to Multan, risking Sind but saving the Punjab. It is this independence and active initiative that was the distinguishing feature of Frere's character. He knew what was right, and could not bear to be shackled by incompetent authority or political intrigue. When these forces, as was the case during his High Commissionership in South Africa, were combined, the man of vision and independence was doomed to failure. These outstanding features of Frere's career are clearly described by his biographer and defender in a volume of more than usual interest and value, which corrects many errors of fact on the part of other writers.

FRIENDSHIP.

"THE DAY'S JOURNEY." By W. B. Maxwell. (London: Thornton Butterworth. 7s. 6d. net.)

We are introduced to old Wilfred Heber and Carrington Bird, who are down at Beach End together, as usual, in the summer to play golf, thoroughly unpopular with the other members of the golf club, one a bad-tempered nuisance and the other a bore. We realise that in "The Day's Journey" Mr. Maxwell is going to trace the course of their friendship. We go back and begin where they are boys together in Hampshire. "Bird's first recollection of Heber was a darkly radiant, invincibly attractive smile"—and now they are two unattractive, quarrelsome old bores.

We begin to rebel. "Yes," we feel, "we suppose life is often like that; but what a pity, and we don't want to read about it." But Mr. Maxwell's pleasant manner leads us on, and, when we have accompanied the friends on their life's journey, we are left with a deeper feeling of kindness to those unsatisfactory creatures, ourselves and our fellow mortals. Mr. Maxwell never relents from the realism of his first picture of Bird and Heber; they are never idealised. He never sentimentalises over their friendship; he never tries to soften the incidents which make one or other of them ridiculous. They both marry late in life, and both marriages are failures in different dreary, commonplace ways. How clearly in so little space we are shown those two homes! There are long periods when, either because of circumstances or because they have quarrelled, they do not meet. But, at the moments that really matter, they never fail one another, although it is apparently usually Bird who gives and Heber who takes. They both manage to serve in the War, although they are over fifty, and they have one of their absurd quarrels because Heber joins up first. Mr. Maxwell makes us see, what could not have been seen by an outside observer, that their friendship was by far the greatest thing they possessed, and something of real beauty. He has done this and has caused us to know the two men with an unhesitating skill, with an unerring choice of the essential which makes of this most humorous and readable novel a real achievement. At the end, when we return to Heber, after an illness, being atrociously rude to Bird, who is radiant at this sign of his friend's convalescence, it does not matter that Heber is impossibly cantankerous and that Bird is the most devastating of bores—we have been taught to know, to understand, and to love.

THE FAUNA OF IRAK.

"A SURVEY OF THE FAUNA OF IRAK: MAMMALS, BIRDS, REPTILES, Etc." Made by Members of the Mesopotamia Expeditionary Force, "D," 1915-1919. (Bombay: "The Times" Press. Rs. 7-8.)

During the War an immense number of natural historical specimens were obtained by members of the Expeditionary Forces serving in Mesopotamia and Persia, and during the years 1918-1923 these specimens were collected by the Bombay Natural History Society, identified, and, generally, had papers written upon them. This volume must be particularly fascinating to naturalists who have served in Irak either in military or civil capacity, for its excellent illustrations awaken the interest of even the ordinary reader. We know of no better way of commending the "Survey" than by publishing here a letter received from Sir Percy Cox, late High Commissioner in Irak.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—Will you kindly permit me, through the medium of your columns, to commend to the attention of your readers interested in natural history a compilation recently brought out by the Bombay Natural History Society, entitled "A Survey of the Fauna of Iraq."

This "Survey" presents, in a single compact volume, a number of papers and notes dealing with collections made in various branches of natural history by members of the British Expeditionary Force campaigning in the land of the two rivers between 1915 and 1919.

The publication of such a compilation, inevitably a costly enterprise, was rendered financially possible in this case only by the close and cordial co-operation of the Civil Authorities in Irak (in the first instance Sir Arnold Wilson and later the present Irak Administration) with the Bombay Natural History Society. In his preface to the volume, the Secretary of that Society, whose help and encouragement to their efforts was greatly appreciated by contributors, emphasises the difficult conditions of field service under which the collections were made. On the other hand, the fluctuating tide of war often carried officers to out-of-the-way localities which it would have been difficult to visit in times of peace. At any rate, is seems clear that the collective results achieved proved of real scientific value, for the Scientific Correspondent of The Times has rendered handsome testimony thereto in an article dealing with the volume in a recent issue of that paper. In the course thereof he writes:

". . . no less than 92 species new to science were discovered and are described in this volume, and, in addition, the known range of a much larger number of creatures has been extended and a large fund of information as to habits has been gained."

I have ventured to ask your co-operation in the belief that the papers will interest many who served in the Middle East region during the War or who are stationed there now, and that it is through the medium of your columns that their attention to the publication is most likely to be attracted.

The book is obtainable from: Dulau and Co., Ltd., Margaret Street, Cavendish Square; The Bombay Natural History Society, Bombay; The Times Printing and Publishing Co., Baghdad and Basrah. Price, 7 rupees 8 annas, or 10s.—I am, etc.,

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE EX-SULTAN.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—In your issue of January 3 you quote the Manchester Guardian as saying that King Hussein "is housing the ex-Sultan, who still claims to be Khalif, at Mecca."

Though you omit to comment on this statement, I have no doubt that you are aware that the ex-Sultan quitted Mecca long ago, and is now much more comfortably installed in a villa at San Remo. But, as some of your readers may share the ignorance, in regard to this little detail, of the writer in the Manchester Guardian, and the detail is not without a certain importance of its own, I venture to think that it may be worth while to correct it.

THE LITTLE ENTENTE; THE PARTING OF THE WAYS.

This week the Foreign Ministers of the States of the Little Entente meet at Belgrade. There will, no doubt, be the customary reaffirmation of the solidarity of the relations between the three countries, and the Conference will then set to work to deal in a practical manner with economic and financial matters, as well as with transit problems. At the same time, questions affecting the foreign policy of the Little Entente are bound to come up for consideration. Roumania, it is understood, will raise the question of Poland's joining the Entente, Czecho-Slovakia will be expected to refer to her recent treaty with France, and for Yugoslavia relations with Bulgaria and Greece must at least call for an up-to-date report. Accordingly, whether as a definite item in the agenda or as the result of an informal exchange of views between the three Foreign Ministers, the Little Entente's foreign policy stands to be influenced by this Conference. In these circumstances, it would seem worth while for the component States to take careful stock of their position and to try to form long-sighted views rather than to allow their future policy to be fashioned by purely extraneous considerations and by influences of possibly a temporary character. The Little Entente itself was begotten of very circumscribed views. The three States were afraid of Magyar aggression, and by a series of conventions bound themselves to common action with a view to prevent any attempt on the part of Hungary to upset the Treaty of Trianon. As an emergency measure there was something to be said for such an agreement. If Hungary had been contemplating a policy of revenge, the knowledge that she would have to deal with the three States at once must have acted as an effective deterrent. It is also natural that advantage should be taken of the conventions to promote the common interests of the countries in other directions. At this point, however, it becomes an entirely different matter, if it is proposed without adequate reflection to make the Little Entente the basis of the foreign policy for all time of each of the States. The Little Entente, formed for a definite purpose, has well served that purpose, and may continue to do so; but the question that each country must decide for itself is whether a passing anxiety regarding the intentions of Hungary is the best foundation on which its future in regard to Europe as a whole can be built.

In these pages we are concerned primarily among the States of the Little Entente with Roumania and Yugoslavia. Czecho-Slovakia is a Succession State, but geographically her position is in Central Europe, and close identification with her must give the other States a Central European orientation. The question arises whether this is the best thing that can happen to Roumania and Yugoslavia. Neither of these States can afford to stand alone, both must seek Allies, and it is for them to decide whether they will be drawn piecemeal into the orbit of one or more of the Great Powers or whether they will use their geographical position to form the equal of a Great Power themselves. The alternative to the Little Entente is a Balkan Confederation of a compact group of States forming a geographical as well as an economic unit. As a political entity they could withhold themselves at will free from European complications, while commanding, if necessary, attention in the councils of Europe. Their interests, when once they have eradicated the bitternesses of the past, will be found to be identical or at least correlated, and, freed from alarms and anxieties both within the Peninsula and outside, they can devote their whole attention to their material development. If, on the other hand, Roumania and Yugoslavia have no foreign policy outside the Little Entente, what is the prospect before them? The treaty between Czecho-Slovakia and France supplies the answer. The close association between these two countries—whatever the form or scope of the alliance—may be both wise and inevitable; but it does not necessarily follow that it is prudent or advantageous for Roumania and Yugoslavia to be drawn into the same understanding. To-day the peaceful intentions of France and Czecho-Slovakia are emphasised, and Czecho-Slovakian apologists are assuring us that in this instance, at any rate, the tail can be relied upon to wag the dog. All this may be true, but it is quite certain that, if ever France feels called upon to fight for her own interests, she will make sure of having Czecho-Slovakia with her, or will know the reason why. For the Czecho-Slovakians this fate may entail no special hardships; they are in and of Central Europe, facing both west and east, and they may wish for nothing better than to be linked with the most powerful State at the moment on the Continent. Roumania and Yugoslavia, however, are in an entirely different position. A Balkan Confederation would have no need to make itself the satellite of any Great Power. At the present time it could, if it were true to itself and stood four-square to the world, dispense with any entangling alliances, knowing that its own strength would be sufficient to deal with any danger likely to arise in the immediate future.

We hope, therefore, that the Roumanian and Yugoslav Governments, before they commit themselves further in the direction of Little Entente solidarity, will reflect on the goal to which it is leading them. It is not at all desirable that there should be any weakening of the Little Entente until there is something adequate to the interests of the States concerned to take its place. The three-cornered agreement that has prevented the stirring of false hopes in Hungary, let it be said once more, has been a perfectly sound policy; but it remains to be considered whether its place cannot be taken by something which will achieve the same end and also allow fuller scope for the promotion of the real interests of Roumania and Yugoslavia. France is paying court to them to-day, as she has paid court for the last year to Czecho-Slovakia. Is it imagined in Bucharest and Belgrade that the French Government is actuated solely by concern for Roumanian and Yugoslav interests? Its whole political horizon is bounded exclusively by Germany, who, whatever menace she may hold for France, cannot possibly cross the paths of the Balkan States for a generation or more. If Roumania and Yugoslavia, adopting a policy that may be essential for Czecho-Slovakia, but for them is a costly luxury, enter the French orbit, they can do so only at the expense of Balkan unity. Association with one Great Power inevitably leads a neighbour State to look for support from another Great Power, and the breach in the Balkans is made wider. Such a policy can have nothing to commend it as compared with one which links together the interests of the Balkan States and leaves them outside the alarms and excursions of the hostile camps of Great Powers.

A RESTORATION NAVAL CHAPLAIN IN THE MEDITERRANEAN.

By H. C. LUKE.

The reign of Charles II. was a period of great importance in the history of the English Navy. It was a period of rapid progress in size and efficiency, a period in which were laid the foundations of British supremacy at sea that became an established fact in the wars with Napoleon. The Restoration Navy had the advantage of constant activity. If there was peace with Holland or France, there were always the Barbary States to be kept in order or punished for their intolerable piracy and acts of aggression. Gibraltar was not yet British, but in the port of Tangier, which Charles had acquired as part of his Queen's dowry, and retained until 1683, England possessed a useful base for her activities in the Western Mediterranean. Tripoli, in particular, was a source of much trouble at this time; and in 1674 it became necessary to despatch an expedition under Admiral Sir John Narborough against this truculent corsair State. The operations against Tripoli continued during the early spring of 1675, and were crowned with success. The corsairs were compelled to sue for peace, and in March, 1675, Sir John imposed on them a treaty which curbed very materially their power for mischief. Shortly afterwards, however, the people of Tripoli rose against the Government which had signed the treaty. The Dey, Ibrahim, barely escaped with his life, the treaty was ignored, and the pirates resumed their depredations on English shipping. Fortunately, the Admiral was still in the Mediterranean. He reappeared before Tripoli with eight frigates, and without further parley proceeded to batter the city with such effect that the new Government promptly sued for a renewal of the peace.

Among the eye-witnesses of the later operations was an interesting but little-known personage, a truly typical product of his time. This was the Rev. Henry Teonge, chaplain of H.M.S. Assistance, Captain William Houlding, a frigate which joined Sir John's flag off Tripoli in 1675. An old Cavalier, Teonge was Vicar of Spernall in Warwickshire, and was a man of fifty-four when res angusta domi drove him to leave his quiet country parish and to go to sea in the Assistance. Happily for himself, his genial and sanguine temperament enabled him to bear with equanimity the effects of so sharp a transition. Human and humorous, and a bon viveur, but well read, intelligent, and with acute powers of observation, he contrived to extract a considerable measure of enjoyment, and certainly much interest, from his cruises, despite the dangers and discomforts which then attended a seafaring career. Besides participating in the attack on Tripoli, he visited, as will be seen, a large number of countries bordering on the Mediterranean, western and eastern, and indulged in much good cheer; and he recorded his experiences in his diary with quaint and pungent humour and with the outspoken frankness of the age. He died in 1690 in his seventieth year, and for more than a century after his death the diary lay unpublished in the library of a Warwickshire family. A discerning London publisher then bought it and printed it, but since its publication another century has all but passed, and the book is well-nigh forgotten. Yet Teonge's experiences on the Barbary Coast, in the Archipelago, in Malta, Cyprus, Alexandretta, Aleppo, and elsewhere are too interesting to be lost in oblivion, for the light that he throws not only on life and discipline in the Navy, but on conditions in the outlying provinces of the Grand Signor, he deserves to be recalled to public memory. In the following pages I have made a selection from some of the most interesting passages of the diary, allowing old Teonge to speak for himself in his robust and graphic language.

The diary begins with his departure from Spernall, which was not unlike that of D'Artagnan from his home in Gascony :—

Thursday, May 20, 1675. Deus vortat bene!

This day I began my voyage from my house at Spernall, in the county of Warwick; with small accouterments, saveing what I carried under me in an olde sack. My steed like that of Hudibras, for mettle, courage, and color, (though not of the same biggnes:) and for flesh, one of Pharaoh's leane mares, ready to cease (for hunger) on those that went before her, had shee not beene short winged; or rather leaden heeled. My stock of monys was also proportionable to the rest; being little more than what brought me to London, in an old coate, and britches of the same; an old payre of hose and shooes; and a lethern dublett of 9 yeares olde and upward. Indeeds, (by reason of the suddennes of my jurny,) I had nothing but what I was ashamed of; save only

An old fox broade-sword, and a good black gowne;
And thus Old Henry cam to London towne.

Hither was I no sooner arived, but I was courteously received; first by Leiuetenant Haughton, with bottells of claret, etc.; and after, by Capt. William Houlding, with entertainment of the same fashon.

Thence to the Longe Reach; where I was that morning entred on board Chaplen to His Magesty in his Frigott Assistance, of 56 gunns, and under the command of Captain Will. Houlding; and returned againe that night to London.

And now a small sea-bed is my unum necessarium, (though I wanted almost every thing else:) a thing that I could not bee without; nor knew I how to compas it. I sent for som bedding into the country; and I try som friends to borrow som monys; but all in vaine; and all to retreeve my cloake, left longe since (in pawn), not at Troas, (as Saint Paule's was,) for his was recovered only with demaund; mine could not be got by fayer or foule meanes. Seeing no other meanes I rem'bred the poet:—

ἀργυρίαις λόγχαισι μαχοῦ καὶ πάντα κράτησις

I sum'on all my forces, and I borrow 5s. of my landlady; and thus I redeemed my cloake: lying only for 10s. Haveing done thus, my leane mare, with saddle, bridle, and bootes, and spurrs, I sold to my landlord for 26s., upon condition that if 26s. was sent to him in a fortnight's time, the mare might be redeemed, but the other things lost. And my cloake I pawne againe for 40s.

On June 1 he embarked at Blackwall, and, after a slow and uneventful passage down Channel (interrupted at various points for the pressing of seamen) and across the Bay of Biscay, the Assistance arrived off Lisbon on July 10.

July 10.

Wee are past the Rock of Lysbon, but could not discover it by reason of the fogg. This day our noble Capt. feasted the officers of his small squadron with 4 dishes of meate, viz., 4 excellent henns and a peice of porke boyled, in a dish; a giggett of excellent mutton and turnips; a peice of beife of 8 ribbs, well seasoned and roasted; and a couple of very fatt greene geese; last of all, a greate Chesshyre cheese; a rare feast at shoare. His liquors were answerable; viz. Canary, Sherry, Renish, Clarett, white wine, syder, ale, beare, all of the best sort; and punch like (as plentiful as) ditch water: with which wee conclude the day and weeke in drinking to the Kinge, and all that wee love; while the wind blows fayre.

Sunday, July 11.

The wind is very calme, and I preacht a sermon text, Luke viii. 15.

July 22.

This morne wee are neare the edge of the Gulfe of Lyons; a very dangerous place for stormes; lying north from us as we sayle. The winde very fayre, and the sea quiet enough, though usually here about tis very ruff. This day wee have a fayre on our quarter deck; viz. our pursor opens his pack, and sells to the value of 30 pounds or more, shirts, drawers, wascots, neckcloats, stockings, shooes, and takes no mony for them; this is newes.

July 26.

This morn brings with it a pleasant gale after our yesterday's calm; and this morning (as tis the use at sea) is black Munday with the boyes, who are many of them whipt with a catt with 9 tayles for their misdemeanurs, by the boarsons mate.

August 1.

This morn wee com near Malta; or as twas called formerly Melitta, from the abundance of hony they have there, gathered by the bees from the annice seeds, and flowers thereof, which groe on this Iland abundantly. Before wee com to the cytty a boate with the Malteese flagg in it coms to us to know whence wee cam. Wee told them from England; they asked if wee had a bill of health for prattick, viz. entertaynment; our Capt. told them that he had no bill but what was in his gunns mouths. Wee came on and anchored in the harbour betweene the old towne and the new, about 9 of the clock; but must waite the governour's leasure to have leave to com on shoare; which was detarded, because our Capt. would not salute the cytty, except they would retaliate. At last cam the Consull with his attendants to our ship, (but would not com on board till our Capt. had been on shoare.) to tell us that wee had leave to com on shoare 6 or 8 or 10 at a time, and might have any thing that was there to be had; with a promise to accept our salute kindly. Whereupon our Capt. tooke a glasse of sack and drank a health to King Charles, and fyred 7 gunns: the cytty gave us 5 againe; which was more than they had don to all our men of warr that cam thither before. This being done our Capt. sent his lieuetenant and som more of our gentlemen to salute the Grand Master; and to tell him that he would waite on him the next morning. . . . The hospital is a vast structure, wherin their sick and woonded lye. Tis so broade that 12 men may with ease walke a brest up the midst of it; and the bedds are on each syd, standing on 4 yron pillars, with white curtens, and vallands, and covering, extremely neate, and kept cleane and sweete; the sick served all in sylver plate, and it containes above 200 bedds below, besyds many spatious roomes in other quadrangles with in; for the chiefe cavaliers and knights, with pleasant walkes and gardens; and a stately house for the chiefe doctor and other his attendants.

The Lazaretta (a place on purpose for such as are sick of the plague or other pestilentiall diseases; which in regard of the heate of that country doth often rage there;) lyes closse under their outermost wall, and is extremely neatly kept and provided for.

This Cytty is compassed almost cleane round with the sea, which makes severall safe harbours for hundreds of shipps. The people are generally extremely courteous, but especially to the English. A man can not demonstrate all their excellencys and ingenuitys. . . . Let it suffice to say thus much of this place: viz. Had a man no other buisnes to invite him, yet it were sufficiently worth a man's cost and paines to make a voyage out of England on purpose to see that noble cytty of Malt, and their works and fortifications about it. Severall of their knights and cavaliers cam on board us, 6 at on time, men of sufficient courage and friendly carriage, wishing us good successe in our voyage; with whom I had much discourse, I being the only entertainer, because I could speake Latine; for which I was highly esteemed, and much invited on shoare again.

On August 9 the Assistance reaches Tripoli, where she finds the Henrietta, flying Sir John Narborough's flag, and the frigates Newcastle, Dragon, Swallow, Dartmouth, Roebuck, and Mary Rose.

August 16.

This morn (as wee ly at anchor) 4 slaves ventered to swim from the shoare to our shipps, to make their escapes; whereof on of them was overtaken by a Trypoly boate, and carryed back to be miserably tortured. The other 3 cam on board us; on of them almost dead, being taken up by the Admirall's boate: the other twoe were tooke up by our boate. On of them had got a piece of an olde raile, and a goate skinn, which he had tyed together at boath ends, and blowed it full of wind, and made it fast to the olde raile: with that engine they cam safe on board. Two of them were Greeks, and the other a French man.

September 8.

Now about seven of the clock two lusty shipps are coming out of the harbour of Trypoly in the sight of all our fleete. Every on makes ready to fight them; but immediately there fell a thick mist between them and us, that wee could not see them just when the cam out. They had also a fresh gale, and wee scarce so much wind as would stir a ship. Two of our ships that were crusing eastward did almost meete them, and on of them, viz: the Dartmouth, made som shott at them, but all in vaine, for they clearly out sayled us all; in so much, that by 3 of the clock they had run us all quite out of sight.

The escape of the two corsairs necessitated an alteration in the Admiral's plans. Fearing that English merchant shipping in the Mediterranean would thereby be endangered, he sent three of his ships, Dragon, Dartmouth, and Assistance, in pursuit of the pirates. Their orders were to proceed together to the Archipelago and there part company, Dragon and Dartmouth making for Smyrna, and Assistance for "Scanderoond" (Alexandretta).

October 4.

This morning (haveing had a prosperous gale all night) wee are in sight of that famous iland of Cyprus, once in the possession of the English; and a very plentifull iland, stored with good things.

October 14.

And here we ly becalmed all this while, and very hott; and now wee tow in our ship, for wee can gett her in no other way. And at 4 in the afternoone wee com to an anchor in Scanderoond Roade; where wee find 3 ships at anchor. The Syppio, whoe saluts us with 5 gunns, wee returne 3; she thanks us with on more. The William and Thomas gave us 3 gunns; we answered with on. The 3d was a Venetian, and gave us 7 gunns; and wee returned 5. Then went out Leieuetenant and Pursor on shoare, to see what provision or liquor was to be gott. The Consull, Mr. Low, cam on board to welcom us, and brought foules and herbs to us. At his going off wee gave him 5 gunns, and our trumpetts sounding—Mayds, where are your harts, etc.

October 22.

No thing done but goeing too and froe to shoare and from shoare. But on Wensday last fell much raine, with thunder and lightening; and wee all saw severall spouts, boath drawn up from the sea, and also faull in to the sea againe. But especially wee saw on great spout drawne up out of the bay, and carryd to land; and wee saw it breake and fall on the syd. It fell neare the house of a servant to the Caddee, and drive it downe, and also carrye it and all in it away, with him selfe, his wife, and 2 children. The woman was this day found at Asshen Poynt, (not above a leage from us,) beaten all in pieces.

November 3.

Wee scrape our quarter deck, mend sayles, and fetch butts from shoare. At 5 a clock cam the Greate Basshaw from the Grand Senior, and many more brave Turks with him to see our ship: we entertaynd him with our trumpetts and 7 gunns, and 7 at his going. He goes his syrkett every yeare in the nature of on of our Judges, to heare grievances, and to doe justice, and to enquire into the state of all affayres in this syrkett, once a yeare. And so the greate Turke sends of these men every yeare through out all his teritorys. This Bashaw hath 500 horse attending on him, and goes in greate state, and is as it were in the nature of an English Collonell, but that he hath also the power of lyfe and death at his owne pleasure.

November 8.

I began to nett my sylke gyrdle.

November 9.

I was invited to dinnar with our Captaine, and our Doctor, our Pursor, Capt. Mauris, and Capt. North, to our Consulls on shoare; where wee had a princelike dinnar; and every health that wee dranke, every man broake the glasse he drank in; so that before night wee had destroyd a whole chest of pure Venice glasses; and when dinnar was ended, the Consull presented every on of us with a bunch of beads, and a handfull of crosse, for which he sent to Jherusalem on purpose, as he tolde us afterwards.

December 6.

This part of Asya is called Cylicia. And in this very place (which is called the Straits of Cylicia, which lys betweene Tarsus and Scanderoond, and is the greate roade way betweene Constantinople and Jherusalem; and is a very narrow passage betweene the sea and the mountaine Taurus) did Alexander the greate in person, with 30,000 men, give Darius a greate overthroe, who had at least an hundred thousand men. And in memory of this his victory, he built a small cytty, and called it Alexandria; and to distinguish it from Alexandria in Egypt, it was called Alexandretta, and now Scanderoond. The bay is rather an elbow than a half-moone; and the towne stands in the south-east corner, which hath beene far biger. There remains also the ruins of an old brick castle, but it never could be of any considerable strength. But on of the Gaws of Scanderoond began the platforms of a stronge fortification, and built it 6 or 10 yards high, and the greate gate leading into it was built quite over the arch; but the Grand Seniore haveing notice of it, and knowing not but that it might prove a nursery of rebellion, (for the Turks are very jealous people) sen 2 mutes, which brought away his heade, and so the work lyes as he left it to this very day.

PRESS ON THE NEAR EAST.

Yugoslavia.

Under the heading "Centralism and Autonomy in Jugoslavia," M. Franjo Suklje, the Catholic Slovene, contributes to the Slavonic Review for January an interesting essay upon the present difficulties of the Triune Kingdom and the way out. He begins by explaining how, at the birth of the new State, Croats and Slovenes joined enthusiastically with the Serbs, without a thought how the groups then politically united would live together. Now they see their folly, and, M. Suklje continues:—

> One thing is certain, that Centralism is, of all forms of government, the worst possible for Jugoslavia. It presupposes the existence of an experienced, thoroughly qualified and honest bureaucracy, and in Serbia and Croatia such a thing simply does not exist. . . . Though linguistically we are virtually one, it must be recognised that linguistic unity is not in itself enough to constitute a single nation. In our case unity is counteracted by the fact that, though originally one people, we have never within historic times all lived together. Those who have inhabited the wide lands from the sources of the Save to the Vardar and the Serbian Morava, have always been divided, alike from the politic, economic, and cultural point of view, and have never, even temporarily, all been united. Moreover, they have lived on the watershed between the Byzantine and the Roman world, and thus, though to-day united in one State, they belong to two different civilisations, and have two essentially divergent outlooks upon the world. The Catholic Slovenes and Croats have, since the beginning of their history, been under the influence of Rome, while the orthodox Serb looks to Byzantium.

In Croatia and Slovenia, he proceeds, the view is widely held that Belgrade is impervious to the Yugoslav idea, but is merely following a "Great Serbian" policy. With the Croats, moreover, who are a fiery and thoughtless people, co-operation by Serbia is even more difficult than with the more sober Slovenes. In Slovenia, he goes on, legislative measures have been taken which have deteriorated the economic situation, and the methods of Serbia generally are backward as compared with those obtaining in pre-War Slovenia.

The present situation is, he says, untenable, and the real question is: How far can self-government be extended without endangering the unity of the State? A stereotyped scheme for the grant of autonomy must be avoided, but autonomous institutions ought to be adapted to the stage of development and resources of the individual units. "The enormous disparity between the economic, social, and cultural structure of the various provinces of Jugoslavia must force Parliament in many cases to pass special laws applicable only to certain districts, and to leave their execution to a local legislature." Provincial autonomy which should allow the local authority to control all matters of culture, social welfare, education, communal legislation, and perhaps justice, should be sufficient. But the interests of the State, he concludes, must always stand higher than any local interests. "Even the most confirmed separatist must realise only too clearly that there is no possible shelter for his national existence save within the borders of Jugoslavia. Once separated from his Serbian brethren, he would instantly be divided up by hostile neighbours, and would fall a helpless prey to Italian, Magyar, and German ambitions. And once this fate had befallen the Slovene, the turn of the Croats would speedily come." His formula for the necessary compromise is: "Revision of the Vidordan Constitution in the sense of a moderate legislative autonomy."

Afghanistan.

The Peshawar Correspondent of The Times contributes to the issue of January 5 an examination of the present position on the North-West Frontier. He says that certain murders, such as those of isolated officers, may be justly classed as "a normal Frontier risk," but in regard to "the horrible outrages in Kohat and Parachinar, we are on different ground." It is not, he says, so much the system of protection that needs revising: —

> What is of immediate and vital importance is the liquidation of a local situation which permits one desperate band, less than a dozen strong, to render nugatory otherwise favourable conditions. The people of a jungle village do not migrate or permanently alter their whole social system when a man-eating tiger is abroad, but their social system is thrown into disorder for the time being, and they leave no stone unturned until the pest is extirpated; they even claim as of right the assistance of the "Sirkar" and the power of modern lethal weapons.
> Herein lies the moral. What the British community on the Frontier has a right to demand is that the Government should use its might and every suitable weapon in its armoury without equivocation or delay to exterminate the murder gang, and to ensure that conditions shall never exist in future such as have cost the lives of Colonel and Mrs. Foulkes in 1920, and of Mrs. Ellis and Captain and Mrs. Watts in 1923; also that this should be done quickly before yet another outrage is committed.
> What those conditions are is fairly well known to the newspaper-reading public. The murder gang has found, and still enjoys, asylum a mile or two beyond British jurisdiction, in the administered territory of a sovereign and independent State, with which Great Britain is on terms of friendship. The reasons which have made this possible are various, complicated, and, in some aspects, sinister. The harbourage afforded to this gang is the most glaring, but not the only instance of an unneighbourliness on the part of Afghanistan, which is fraught with danger, not only to the lives of English men and women, but to the future peace of the Frontier and of adjoining tracts of India. The extermination, in the first instance, of the murder gang, with or without the co-operation of Afghanistan; the insistence, without wavering or compromise, upon full guarantees against harbourage in future, and the elimination from positions of influence of all the hostile forces which now work for insecurity, are what the situation demands. These, and not the herding of women into forts, the provision of armed guards and wire entanglements, are the steps necessary to prevent more murders.

MOTOR TOURS IN THE SAHARA.

The Compagnie Générale Transatlantique has for two seasons past been running, with the co-operation of the big native chiefs, camel caravans through the sand dunes of the Sahara desert between the oasis of Touggourt and Tozeur. These caravans have proved immensely popular with English people. The journey has occupied ten to twelve days, and the daily progression has been mainly dependent upon wells existing on the route. Many people have wanted to make this romantic journey, but have not been able to spare the time or the money, for a number of native attendants and many pack animals have been necessary. Another hindrance to some people has been the dislike to spend ten successive days in the saddle. For nearly two years experiments have been made with motor traction, but until now no type of vehicle has been found capable of giving entire satisfaction—from a passenger-carrying point of view—owing to the deep shifting sands and the immense dunes. An entirely new type of car has been designed by Messrs Renault. This car has three axles each bearing two twin wheels; in other words, the car has twelve tyres. These are pneumatic and of very large diameter, and all wheels are compensated to carry full share of load. The four rear wheels are actuated by direct drive from the engine, and not by rubber belts from the rear wheels. The new cars have been put to most exhaustive tests, and have been found capable of travelling at considerable speed through the deepest sands or snow. The company decided, therefore, to use these cars for touring through the desert, and the inaugural caravan, consisting of two cars containing, amongst others, the chairman of the Compagnie Générale Transatlantique, Dal Piaz, his wife and daughter and representatives of the Press, left Touggourt on December 28, and reached Tozeur safely on January 1, after visits to the oases of El Oued and Nefta. The journey in the new style has occupied two running days instead of ten to twelve required by animal transport.

The success of the new type of cars has been so very startling that it would seem that a new era is commencing in opening up the hitherto inaccessible portions of the Sahara and the Sudan, and, in fact, of any desert where the sands are loose and shifting.

NEWS IN BRIEF.

Ghazi Mustapha Kemal Pasha arrived in Smyrna on January 3. He has taken up his residence in an English villa at Boudjah.

The Persian Government has decided to sell a part of the Crown jewels and other precious articles in order to raise money for the construction of railways.

The Irak primary elections are still incomplete in Basrah and Kirkuk. The secondary elections are expected to be held in a fortnight's time. The Assembly should meet early in February.

Mahmud Pasha Fakry, the new Egyptian Minister in Paris, arrived at the French capital to take up his duties on January 1. The Minister was accompanied by his wife, Princess Fewkieh, the eldest daughter of the King of Egypt.

The Teheran correspondent of the Pioneer reports that the Chief of Staff, who is now in Europe, has purchased from France 12 aeroplanes for the Army, and also that the contract of General Westdahl, the Swedish Chief of Police, having expired, he is being replaced by a Persian.

News has been received by his relatives that Flight-Lieutenant John McAlery, No. 1 Squadron, Royal Air Force, was killed last Thursday in an aeroplane accident at Hinaidi, Irak. He was the son of a well-known Ulster clergyman, and served in France during the war with the Ulster Division and with the Royal Flying Corps.

We have received from the Greek Press Bureau, Limassol, Cyprus, the following telegram, dated January 5:—"M. Araouzos, the delegate of the National Assembly, has returned. The town was decorated with Greek flags and the bells were rung. The Mayor expressed his gratitude and declared that the population's will was unaltered. Great masses of the people cheered for union with Greece."

Major Radclyffe Dugmore, famous for his film on big game in East Africa ("The Wonderland of Big Game"), is leaving England on January 17 for an expedition to the Sudan. He has been invited to go there by the Sudan Government to take pictures not only of the beasts and birds of the country in the places where they live, but also of shy native tribes, engaged in their daily vocations.

BRITISH MUSEUM LECTURES.

The lectures at the British Museum by Miss Claire Gaudet on Comparative Archæology will be continued to-day (Thursday), at 4.30 p.m. The subject of the lecture will be "The Infancy of Classical Architecture," showing the evolution of the Greek Temple from the earliest times.

APPOINTMENTS, PROMOTIONS, &c.

M. Kimon Diamantopoulos, First Secretary at the Greek Legation in London, has been appointed Consul-General at Constantinople.

Mr. Arthur Page, K.C., an Additional Judge of the High Court of Calcutta, has been appointed a Puisne Judge of the Court in succession to Sir Ashutosh Mukerjee, C.S.I., who is retiring from the Bench.

The King has given authority for the wearing of the following decorations conferred on British subjects by foreign Sovereigns in recognition of valuable services:—

Order of the Nile (Egypt).—Fourth Class—Mr. Maurice Armand Bailey, Chief Botanist of the Egyptian Ministry of Agriculture. Fifth Class—Mr. John Jones, Assistant Superintendent, Cairo City Fire Brigade.

Order of St. Sava (Serbia).—Fifth Class—Miss Christina Elizabeth Smith.

The selected candidates at the recent examinations for the Indian Civil Service are now undergoing their probationary training in this country, a choice being offered of Oxford, Cambridge, or London University. Eleven candidates from each examination, that is, the home examination held in August and the one now held annually in India in January, have been selected. At the examination held in India, nine native candidates were declared successful, but the Government of India added two more by nomination to the list, one of whom competed at the examination, and the other, who was selected for Burma, a non-competitor, educated at Cambridge. It is noteworthy that of the nine successful candidates at the examination held at Allahabad eight were educated at Oxford and one at Cambridge.

Sir George Lloyd, the retiring Governor of Bombay, who is on his way home to England, lunched at the British Residency in Cairo on January 1. He proposed to leave afterwards for Alexandria en route for Constantinople.

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London, W.C.,
Tuesday Morning.

The Political Situation and Trade.

The business community is awaiting developments in the complex political situation with some anxiety. So far, it is true the deadlock resulting from the General Election has had no worse effect than to depress prices on the Stock Exchange (though that is bad enough), but it is not difficult to foresee that the continuance of a period of instability in political affairs may have a most unfortunate repercussion on commerce, at a time, too, when business is just beginning to revive. Trade activity depends very largely on confidence, and where uncertainty exists, the tendency will naturally be to abstain from new commitments. It is, therefore, from every point of view profoundly to be hoped that an arrangement will be reached which will enable the establishment of an Administration of a stable order which will be content to "carry on" for the time being with the minimum of legislation.

Egypt in Winter.

I must say that the details of the Egyptian cruise which the Anchor Line are arranging (particulars of which will be found on another page) intrigue me greatly, and I have no doubt they will many of my readers. An English winter of the type we are having now is all very well when one is young and naïve, but with the passing of the years it becomes anything but attractive, and, personally, I have always been lost in wonder at those who are drawn by the glowing descriptions of the delights of ski-ing, curling, and other winter sports, to Switzerland. The very mention of ice and snow sends cold shivers down my back, and it seems to me that those who feel the need for these undelectable commodities might just as well stay at home. But Egypt in the late winter is a different proposition altogether, and the thought of the balmy Mediterranean breezes and the gentle climate of the Land of the Pharaohs at that period is a tonic in itself. I shall be surprised if the Anchor Line does not experience a rush of applications, always provided that another Dissolution does not compel people to remain in this country owing to the stern necessity of having to exercise the suffrage.

Turkey's Financial Position.

Things have not gone any too well with Turkey in recent months. When the Treaty of Lausanne brought peace I imagine that the Angora authorities had a glowing vision of the arrival at the new capital (if one is to dignify that obscure and squalid place in Anatolia by that term) of long and unending processions of would-be concessionnaires and delegates from Powers anxious to negotiate loans for the new Turkey. Unfortunately for Angora, things have not quite panned out like that, and the Turkish authorities have by now found out, one would think, that concessions that could have been negotiated to advantage before the war are no longer the attraction that they were, owing to the impoverished state of the country, and that they certainly cannot now be used to obtain special terms from the concessionnaires. Turkey's present plight is clearly shown by her financial position. A Budget deficit was inevitable, but the growing excess of expenditure over receipts is evidently surprising the Angora authorities. In a statement recently issued a distinctly confident view was taken of the country's finances generally, but it will be surprising if this tone can be maintained in view of developments. It is, in short, becoming more and more evident that Turkey's early recovery depends on foreign assistance, and if she is to obtain that it is quite clear that there must be a very great change in her policy, which has been marked by so many acts since Lausanne which might have been deliberately designed to alienate foreign sympathies.

The Galata Bridge Tolls.

A further example of the kind of thing that is having a most detrimental effect on Turkish credit abroad is in regard to the Galata Bridge tolls, which have again been seized by the Turkish authorities, though they are pledged to the holders of the City of Constantinople Five per Cent. Bonds of 1909, and have, under the terms of the contract, to be paid in to the National Bank of Turkey each day. The tolls were first diverted from their proper purpose last May, and the excuse was then advanced that by a decision of the Angora Government the coupons were to be paid in French francs, and the tolls already paid were sufficient for the service on that basis. It is, as a matter of fact, specified that, at the option of the bondholders, both the interest and sinking fund are payable in either Turkish gold or sterling. Protests led to the abandonment of the Turkish contention, but the tolls were seized again in October, and the committee of bondholders have now taken the step of formally notifying the Stock Exchange Committee of this Turkish breach of faith. No doubt it may be argued that this action of the bondholders will be no more effective than would be a letter of protest to Angora, but, on the other hand, it is at least probable that Turkey will see the wisdom of doing nothing further to alienate the leading money market of the world.

Countries Suitable for Cotton Growing.

In his article on the world cotton crisis, in Foreign Affairs, to which I referred last week, Professor J. A. Todd passes in review the prospects for cotton growing in a number of countries, and he has much that is of interest to say on this subject. He points out that there are many parts of old Asia which are very suitable for cotton growing. "In fact, even in Afghanistan, and probably right across the continent to China and Korea, conditions suitable for cotton can be found in many areas." He is not optimistic in regard to the immediate outlook in Mesopotamia, and, owing to irrigation and political difficulties, considers it doubtful whether any large addition to the world's supply can be hoped for from that quarter in the near future. Turning to the American continent, he says that "Brazil is at present the chief hope of the world for a substantial increase of the cotton supply. There can be no doubt that Brazil possesses enormous potentialities as a cotton country." We in this country, however, are not concerned with developments in Brazil or in any other region outside the Empire. Safety for Lancashire means an adequate supply of cotton which is home grown, so to speak, and while progress in Brazil may result in alleviating the world situation, it will be impossible for this country to rest content until, as a result of endeavours in the Sudan and elsewhere, it is possible for us to view with complacency happenings in the cotton-growing regions outside the Empire.

A Report Discontinued.

I learn from Messrs. R. J. Moss and Co., of Alexandria, that they have decided to discontinue to print their weekly Egyptian freight and coal circular and general market report, which has been issued without cessation for some sixty years. It was a most useful little circular, and its passing will occasion considerable regret. When it was originally published the circular broke new ground, but the development of trade journals in recent years has given the business world other sources of information; and Messrs. Moss state that they recognise that the usefulness of the circular is no longer what it was. "Owing to the largely increased movements of shipping in our busy port," Messrs. Moss add, "the weekly work of preparing the circular and keeping it absolutely correct and up to date, which has always been our aim, has of late years become very great, and we feel that what was originally a task well worth undertaking is now an unnecessary labour." They will, however, continue to keep records of the latest statistics, and will always be glad to furnish information regarding movements in the port.

THE INDIAN ORDNANCE FACTORIES AND INDIAN INDUSTRIES.

The following is taken from a paper read by Brigadier-General H. A. Young, C.I.E., C.B.E., R.A. (retired), before the Indian section of the Royal Society of Arts on January 4 on "The Indian Ordnance Factories and Indian Industries":—

India has allowed industrial towns to develop without much attempt to avoid the evils which any study of the growth of industrialism in Great Britain would have shown to be inevitable unless precautions were taken. Working conditions in many factories, and living conditions in most industrial centres are most unsatisfactory and far from creditable to the Government of the country.

The Ordnance Factories were the pioneer industrial establishments in India, and to-day they hold a leading place in equipment, organisation, and methods, and also in variety and quality of production. They can be, and might be, made a pattern in every respect to the industries of the country, and they can, and should, lead the way in the technical education of the Indian.

Manufacturers in India are asking for protection, and the Commission which is now sitting is receiving much evidence of the impossibility of industries facing overseas competition without high protective duties. It is obvious that India imports much which it could itself manufacture, that it exports material which should be worked up in the country, yet labour is cheap, most materials are available at a reasonable price, land can usually be obtained at a moderate cost, and a huge market is close at hand. Why cannot industries using local materials compete with imports from thousands of miles overseas? There are several reasons, but one of the chief, in my opinion, is the cost of management and of skilled supervision, which often swamps the cheap factors. Labour is cheap individually but is dear in the mass, because it is uneducated, and needs for efficient output a high proportion of skilled supervision. Such supervision has to be mainly European, and is most costly, and where money is saved by limiting this class of supervision, more money is lost in quantity and quality of output. Competition with Europe, except under certain favourable circumstances, is impossible for the ordinary Indian factory till the educated Indian has been trained to supervise mechanical work and to take a proper share in the management of industrial establishments. The eight great ordnance factories provide an ideal training ground for this purpose, and many schemes have been put forward from time to time, and I believe one has at last been sanctioned. If this scheme is broadly conceived, with provision for the training of lads in character as well as for technical education, and if it is for industry generally and not merely for the Government factories, and if the cost is not thrown entirely on the military budget, then it will be of the highest importance in the progress of India.

Complete Indianisation of industrial management is impossible, however, in the near future, and it will never be possible till a generation of educated Indians arises, trained in mechanical and engineering sciences, experienced in subordinate management, and having the power of studying and of assimilating the industrial progress of other countries. European supervision and management in India is by no means entirely satisfactory owing to the difficulty of combining up-to-date technical knowledge with experience of Indian conditions. It is distinctly difficult in India to keep in touch with the rapidly changing ideas and methods of the modern industrial world. Competition is too keen to permit of any falling behind, and industrialism in India has a constant struggle with the climate and other conditions which exercise an enervating influence on the vast majority of people, both Indian and European.

I am convinced that, in a country like India, the Government factories must be used to the fullest extent in the development of industry on sound lines. Moreover, I am certain that their efficiency will be greatly increased if their financial needs do not have to compete with the requirements of every other part of the military organisation. I have no doubt whatever that considerable economy will follow if their accounts are treated as industrial and not as military accounts, and if they are placed in closer touch with the ultimate authority.

(By Our Engineering Representative.)

Vickers and International Combustion Engineering, Ltd.

A new company has recently been registered under the title of Vickers and International Combustion Engineering, Limited, for the manufacture of power plant equipment. Vickers, Limited, are world famous, and it is particularly interesting to be able to announce that the negotiations which have been going on for several months between this company and the International Combustion Engineering Corporation of New York have been successfully concluded. The International Combustion Engineering Corporation is the company which has made such a success of the "Lopulco" patented system of pulverised coal firing for steam boilers; the largest boilers ever built in America or Europe are being equipped with this system, as a result of the remarkable efficiencies and operating economies obtained at other plants, such as the Milwaukee Electric Power Station and the Ford Motor Company and many others. The initial capital of the new company is £500,000, which will be held by the two companies in equal proportions.

The company will manufacture at its own works at Barrow-in-Furness boilers especially adapted for the burning of coal in pulverised form, superheaters, economisers, Raymond impact pulverisers, dryers, air heaters, and all other auxiliary power plant equipment. The company will specialise in designing, building, and equipping complete power plants, all units of which can be manufactured by the company or by companies affiliated with Vickers, Ltd., or International Combustion Engineering Corporation. The directors of the new company are:—Sir A. Trevor Dawson, Bart., vice-chairman and managing director, Vickers, Ltd.; Mr. G. R. T. Taylor, chairman and managing director, Taylor Bros. and Co., Ltd., director of the London, Midland, and Scottish Railway, and managing director of the new company. Mr. G. E. Learnard, president of the International Combustion Engineering Corporation; Mr. W. R. Wood, vice-president of the International Combustion Engineering Corporation. Temporary offices have been taken at 4, Central Buildings, Westminster, where all communications will be dealt with by Mr. G. C. Usher, who has been appointed general and sales manager.

Two Useful Machines.

Two wood-working machines, both driven by electric motors, have recently been placed on the market. The machines, which are designed to reduce the amount of labour in carpentry, depend on no other plant but an electric motor, and they can, therefore, be used for any purpose without interfering with any other work that is going on. The first of the machines is a circular saw, which can be driven by a one-horse power motor, while the second is a bench planer, made in a 4-in. and a 6-in. type, and driven by the same motor as the saw.

Wood-Working Machines.

I have recently received the catalogue of a well-known Belgian firm of wood-working machinery manufacturers, Messrs. Ateliers de Construction Ch. Danckaert. This firm, it is of interest to record, has established an agency in this country, a step which it is only too difficult to make British firms see the need for when they propose to enter a new market, though it is obviously a sine qua non if satisfactory business is to be done. They are usually content to announce their willingness to dispose of certain commodities, and leave it at that; and when business does not come in to an adequate extent their verdict simply is that the market is no good for their class of trade. That has been the case time and time again in connection with the Balkan and other Near Eastern markets.

Imperial Air Transport.

Details of the terms of the agreement in regard to the establishment of the Imperial Air Transport Company show that its field of operation is to be Europe, including the Mediterranean and the Black Sea. For the first four years the minimum yearly mileage is to be 800,000 miles, and for the next six years it is to be 1,000,000. How far it is possible to establish air services on a commercial basis at the present time must remain to be seen. Obviously the tendency will be in time to use the air wherever possible in preference to other forms of transport. The company will be in the position of doing pioneer work in a large part of the region it will cover, and if the venture receives anything like adequate support the company should play no inconsiderable part in British commercial enterprise in the Near East.

La Freccia states that a gold field has been discovered at Radumir in Bulgaria containing gold at a depth of eight to ten metres.

The Imperial Bank of Persia are removing to new premises at 33-36, King William Street, London Bridge, E.C.4, on January 14.

The ordinary general meeting of the Ionian Bank, Ltd., will be held at Basildon House, Moorgate, E.C., on January 22, at 11 a.m.

Sir Eric Geddes, the retiring president of the Federation of British Industries, has signified his willingness to remain in office for another year.

During 1923 the Royal Exchange Assurance issued 2,468 new life policies for net sums assured of £1,677,874, being an increase of £222,804 over the corresponding figure for 1922.

Steaua Romana (British), Limited, have now received advice that Steaua Romana Well No. 246 at Runcu produced by eruption 930 tons during December 29 and 30, after which it sanded up. Immediate steps are being taken to clean out the well. Latest cable advice received is to the effect that Steaua Romana well No. 246 at Runcu flowed 800 tons on January 2, and is still flowing at the same rate.

THE BAGHDAD MARKET.

The following report on market conditions at Baghdad is taken from the monthly circular of the Imperial Ottoman Bank:—

The present trade depression has seriously reflected on all classes of business in the country. Its importance can easily be gauged from the figures of imports and exports of the Baghdad district for September, 1923, which show a considerable decrease as compared with those of the same period of last year. Whilst a boom in the piece-goods market is reported from Manchester following the enhancement of prices of cotton, here a slump of about 7 per cent. has taken place during the month, affecting mainly printed goods. Prices of whites, however, remain steady. This decrease in prices is in sympathy with the recent fall in the sterling exchange, which has depreciated nearly 5 per cent. since the beginning of the month, to-day's rate being 1,430 per 100, as compared with 1,500 of a month ago. A certain amount of activity is prevailing in the market, but no important sales have been effected. The demand from Persia for Manchester piece-goods is great, but prices offered by Baghdad buying agents are low, and no business is being transacted.

The rice crops are in good condition, though rather late in maturing. Harvest of early varieties of rice is in progress.

The total deliveries of cotton at the Baghdad ginnery are 363 tons of seed cotton. Complaints are being made of the severity of the boll-worm attack on cotton. The low yield of cotton is to be attributed to irregular and insufficient supply of irrigation water during the most critical period, July-August.

Prices of wheat and barley continue to be exceptionally low. There is a general desire throughout the country to replace the cereal crop with more remunerative crops, such as cotton, flax, and silk. Not until the necessary handling and marketing facilities are arranged for the flax and silk crops will it be possible to undertake their extensive cultivation. The July-August exports of wheat were 22,253 tons and barley 16,203 tons; total 38,456 tons, as compared with 13,710 tons for the same period last year.

Dates.—The gross yield of the Halawi crop is about 40 per cent. below that of last year, and about 15 per cent. below the average for this variety. Khadhawi and Sayer date harvest is in progress, and both varieties are giving a good crop, now estimated at about 10 per cent. above that of last year. A noticeable improvement has been effected in packing of dates for export. Date growers are beginning to appreciate the greater value of a good quality, early maturing variety of date. The exports of dates during August were 151 tons as compared with 572 tons last year.

NEAR EAST MARKET REPORTS

JAFFA, December 8.

Rain is very badly needed for the growing crops. Owing to this drought the prices of cereals have gone up considerably. No oranges were exported during the week.

HAIFA, December 8.

Business in grain has been active, and offers have been quickly taken.

NABLUS, December 1.

The lack of rain up to the present has influenced the market; a marked rise, especially as regards wheat, has been recorded this week. The purchase of oils by the soap manufacturers continues actively

LONDON PRODUCE REPORT.

Poor Demand for Oranges.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday Morning.

Sugar.—Home refined has continued in fair request at the existing rates. Tate's cubes have come to business at 63s 6d., London granulated has been done at 60s. 7½d., while Lyle's granulated is 60s. 10½d. Foreign descriptions have been steady. West Indian have been done at 29s. 6d., while White Java is quoted at 57s. 9d. Futures are steady. Quotations are :—March 28s., May 27s. 3d., August 27s.

Coffee.—The market has been steady. East Indian is unchanged at 110s., Costa Rica is the same at 106s., Nairobi is unaltered at 100s., while Santos is 2s. up at 72s.

Dried Fruit.—There has been a marked rise in currants as a result of the improvement in the Greek exchange. Stocks here are considerable, and any further advance in prices may have an effect on the trade. Sultanas are also harder. Large stocks of this commodity are also available, and it is to be assumed that in this case and as regards currants this factor will have a retarding effect on prices. A steady demand continues for dates, while figs are in exceptionally strong request; indeed, all the evidence goes to show that this fruit is becoming more and more popular.

Green Fruit.—The demand for oranges is rather weak at the moment, and the accumulation of stocks has affected prices. Quotations are :—Valencias, boxes (240's to 504's), 9s. to 22s. 6d.; Jaffas, boxes (144's to 152's), 13s. 6d. to 14s. 6d. Lemons are in good supply, but fruit of the best quality is scarce. Quotations are :—Cases (300's), 16s. to 20s.; boxes (300's), 11s. to 13s. 6d. Supplies of apples are rather short, and prices are harder.

Oilseeds.—Linseed has been easier. Indian is 19s. 3d., while La Plata is 17s. 10½d. Cottonseed is quiet. Sakellarides has been done at 12s. 6d., while Egyptian black has come to business at 13s. 6d. Rapeseed is firm, with Toria at 19s., and real bold Ferozepore at 19s. 4½d.

Seed Oils.—Linseed has been steady at 43s. 6d. Rape oil is quiet, with crude at 44s. 6d. and technical refined at 47s. Cotton oil has been steady. Refined common edible is 48s., Bombay crude is 42s., Egyptian crude is 43s., technical is 46s., while deodorised is 50s.

Oil Cakes.—The market has been very firm. Linseed cake has been steady at 285s., coconut cake is unchanged at 210s., while cottonseed cake is the same at 180s.

AGRICULTURAL CONDITIONS IN IRAK.

The following extracts are taken from the Agricultural Bulletin of Irak for the period October 16 to November 15 :—The condition of live stock in general is as good as can be expected at the end of the hot season. Grazing continues to be good on lands which were inundated during the flood season. The seasonal rains have as yet been insufficient to germinate the desert grasses or to be of material assistance in preparing the land for winter cereals. At this season the demand for irrigation water is at a minimum, and canal clearance is in general progress. Watering of the cotton and rice crops was discontinued early in October, so as to hasten ripening. In irrigated areas preparatory ploughing of land for winter cereals has started. The barley crop sown on flood "basins" is already well advanced. Early sown winter vegetables are not making normal progress.

The total deliveries of cotton at the Baghdad ginnery are 541 tons of seed cotton, equivalent to about 780 bales of 400 lb. of raw cotton. The cotton crop ceased to yield in the Yusufiyah and Hillah areas towards the end of October; whereas in the Diala and Baghdad Riverain areas the largest pickings of the season are now being collected. The yields of all varieties of cotton grown on the Government Farm are appreciably below those of last year. The unusually small demand for the very large stocks of surplus wheat and barley in the country is giving cotton development a decided impetus. All cultivators of cotton in the current season are strongly advised to uproot the cotton stalks as soon as the plants have ceased to yield. This will help to suppress the outbreak of the bollworm pest of cotton in the coming season. The experimental cultivation of cotton on ridges has again given much better results than when grown on the flat. A pleasing feature of the cotton trade in Irak in the current season is the fact that Messrs. British Cotton Growing Association have decided to increase the price for good quality "Mesowhite" seed cotton from Rs. 425 to Rs. 500 per ton. This is in marked contrast to wheat and barley prices, which continue to fall. Various cotton exhibits are in course of preparation for the British Empire Exhibition.

The July-September exports of wheat were 31,046 tons, and of barley 25,116 tons, total 56,162 tons, as compared with 30,870 tons for the same period last year. The harvest of Halawi and Khadrawi varieties of dates was completed by the middle of October, that of Sayer and Zehdi continues. The total exports of dates up to the end of September was 17,486 tons, valued at Rs. 24,15,434, as compared with 31,100 tons, valued at Rs. 46,03,410, for the same period last year.

It is officially announced that the British Empire Exhibition will not be open on Sundays.

During the first six months of 1923 the steamers calling at Beyrout totalled 324 of a total tonnage of 619,692.

The annual general meeting of the Federation of British Industries will be held at the Hotel Cecil on January 17.

The traffic receipts of the Egyptian Delta Light Railways for the ten days ended December 10 amounted to £E13,856, making the total from April 1 £E218,909.

Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields Output.—Gemsah (week ended January 4), 10 tons (last week 13 tons). Hurghada (week ended January 4), 3,115 tons (last week 3,194 tons).

The tenth congress of Chambers of Commerce of the British Empire will take place in the Council Chamber at the Guildhall on July 1, 2, and 3, under the presidency of Lord Derby.

Narodni Listy states that the Management of the Mines, Belgrade, is appointing a commission of experts to make a thorough investigation into the mineral resources of Southern Serbia and Macedonia.

Bengal-Nagpur Railway.—Holders of debentures, bonds to bearer, amounting to £325,500, and falling due on January 10, 1924, are notified that the debentures will be paid off. They should be presented for payment to Lloyds Bank, Ltd., 72, Lombard Street, E.C.

SMYRNA FRUIT MARKET.

Messrs. C. J. Giraud and Co., of Smyrna, report as follows for the week ended December 22 :—The upward tendency of prices continues, and further gains are recorded this week. The total arrivals to date on the market are 33,600 tons. The total sales are 31,500 tons, as opposed to total shipments of 28,825 tons. The balance on shippers' hands of 2,675 tons can be regarded as pledged against forward sales for January-March shipment to the Continent. The interior is reputed to be still holding some 2,000 tons of fruit, which, together with the unsold stocks in Smyrna of about 2,100 tons, would thus show a total available unsold stock of about 4,100 tons. We give this figure with all reserve, as the range of fruit on offer for sale is of such poor selection that it appears to be in contradiction with an available stock of about 4,000 tons. In the opinion of some dealers this is sought to be explained by the fact that farmers, who even at present level of prices are only just about covering their cost of production, are holding back from sale what is left of any sound fruit they may have possessed; but this again is improbable, as the penury of the interior is undeniable, and farmers are constrained to convert into cash all their available stocks in order to finance themselves to cover expenses for the sowing and cultivation of their next year's crops.

LIVESTOCK IN IRAK.

The following extracts are taken from the Veterinary Bulletin for Irak for October :—Thirteen cases of glanders were detected and destroyed in the Liwas of Basrah, Mosul, and Diala. The majority of the cases occurred in Basrah city.

It was reported in the previous month that a new stable, capable of accommodating about 400 horses, would be erected by the Basrah Baladiya. No progress, however, was made, as the people residing on the selected site have not vacated the land. However, the scheme will be carried out without further delay.

No further spread of surra was reported. The remaining five affected horses died during the month. Cent. per cent death was recorded in this outbreak. The disease was restricted to the area covering the lands occupied by the tribes of Hussain el Ali, Sayid Hassain, and Sayid Jasim, in the Nahiya el Mehairiza, along the Shatt-el-Gharaff. A pamphlet showing the nature, origin, danger, and prevention of the disease was issued to the Mutasarrif of the Kut Liwa for circulation among stockowners.

Four outbreaks of rinderpest were attended to during the month in the Liwas of Mosul and Kirkuk: 210 head of cattle died before veterinary aid could be rendered; 936 animals were protected with anti-rinderpest serum.

BULGARIAN PROPERTY ADMINISTRATION.

The Board of Trade gives notice that the Administrator of Bulgarian Property, Cornwall House, Stamford Street, S.E.1, has prescribed February 29, 1924, as the final date for lodging with him proofs of debts by British nationals against Bulgarian nationals and other claims by British nationals against the Bulgarian Government, the payment of which is charged under Orders in Council upon Bulgarian property, rights, and interests within British territories. All claims not made upon the prescribed forms and lodged with him by the prescribed date will be excluded by the Administrator from the third and final dividend to be declared by him, and the administration closed.

TURKISH TOBACCO.

The current issue of the monthly circular of the Imperial Ottoman Bank contains an article on the tobacco grown in the Marmara district, from which we take the following extracts :—

The qualities concerned are those from Ismidt, Broussa, Balikesser, and from the Constantinople Vilayet. Generally speaking, these tobaccos are of average and inferior qualities, used for filling purposes, and consumed for the greater part in Central Europe, especially by the Monopolies of these countries. Each of the above centres is characterised by the following particulars :—

Ismidt.—The tobaccos of this region are divided into three principal districts: Ismidt, Hendek, Duzdjé, producing about 3 million kilos. The superior "ismidts" bear resemblance to the "baffra" tobaccos, but their quality is inferior.

Hendek.—These are very similar to the Trebizond product; "hendek" is an inferior and cheaper "trebizond." The better qualites were formerly absorbed by Alexandria, but since Trebizond tobaccos are not so much in request by the Egyptian manufacturers, the sale of "hendeks" has been adversely affected; the only outlet is now Central Europe, where prices are less advantageous.

Duzdjé.—This is the best product of the Ismidt region, especially the quality grown at Cassaba and Tchillimy; it is used as a substitute for "Baffra," less expensive, but fairly good owing to the fineness of its leaf.

Broussa: Balikesser.—The production for the two centres amounts to about 3 million kilos. These are the cheapest of the inferior qualities used for mixing with Turkish, excepting the product from Gunen, which is much appreciated by the trade, owing to its lemon-yellow colour.

Constantinople.—The production of the vilayet of Constantinople is concentrated principally at Ghebzeh and Touzla, on the Asiatic coast, and at Chatalja, on the European coast. The yield is three to four thousand kilos. per annum, and the quality is ordinary.

TENDERS INVITED, ETC.

Tenders are invited for the following contracts, and must be made by the dates mentioned.

(Particulars of tenders marked D.O.T. are to be obtained from the Department of Overseas Trade, 35, Old Queen Street, S.W.).

Shipping Intelligence.

PILOTAGE SERVICE IN TURKISH WATERS

Basing their action on the Treaty of Lausanne, the Turkish authorities have notified foreign shipping companies using the port that all loading and unloading operations, Customs formalities, and pilotage must be performed by Moslem Turks, and since yesterday no European has been allowed to board steamers in port here in connection with these services (says a Reuter message from Constantinople, dated January 2). The foreign shipping agents met yesterday to discuss the situation. The question of pilotage, like that of salvage, affects the safety of ships passing through Turkish waters. The supply of Turkish pilots is inadequate, and their efficiency, it is stated, leaves much to be desired.

ANCHOR LINE EGYPTIAN CRUISE.

The Anchor Line has arranged an attractive twenty-six days' cruise to Egypt and the Mediterranean for the end of February. Passengers will leave Liverpool for Port Said by the s.s. "California" on February 29, and will return from Alexandria on March 15 to Plymouth or Glasgow by the s.s. "Tuscania." On the outward journey the only stop will be at Gibraltar, and Port Said will be reached on March 9. A week will be spent in Egypt, and tourists will be afforded the opportunity of seeing all the sights in and around Cairo. On the return journey stops will be made at Naples, where there will be a choice of excursions to Naples town, Pompeii or Vesuvius, Monaco, and Gibraltar.

FORTHCOMING SAILINGS.

The following are the sailings for the Near East and India, the ports of departure and closing dates for cargo being given in parentheses:—

SYRIAN TRADE REVIVAL.

Evidence is forthcoming of the gradual resumption of trade in Syria. According to a Paris contemporary, the movement for the better has developed particularly during the past few weeks. In the case of certain articles there has been an important demand especially for hosiery and cotton goods. As regards the latter, the change has been favoured, above all, by the rise in the price of raw material in the countries of origin, which has encouraged merchants to effect substantial purchases.

The general trend of business has also benefited these last few days, owing to the rate of exchange. Merchants from the interior, who come with gold, have been induced, on this account alone, to buy numerous articles (French, Belgian, and Italian products) quoted in Syrian piastres. The eagerness of the merchants to withdraw their goods from the Customs is an indication of the development of business.

Transactions with the interior have been fairly active, but these would have had a greater fillip if the backwardness of the rainy season had not caused anxiety amongst the peasants, and thus arrested purchases. The activity referred to was particularly in evidence in the trade with Damascus, whose traffic with Transjordania and Palestine is increasing.

INDIA'S OVERSEAS TRADE.

The trade returns of British India for October showed, as compared with the preceding month, increases in the values of both imports and exports. The imports of private merchandise totalled Rs.20,60 lakhs, and showed an increase of Rs.1,87 lakhs. The value of the exports of Indian produce and manufactures rose to Rs.24,57 lakhs from Rs.22,62 lakhs, and re-exports increased by Rs.16 lakhs to Rs.98 lakhs.

Measured by the statistics of merchandise, treasure, council bills, enfaced rupee paper, etc., the visible balance of trade again, after a period of eight months, swung against India to the extent of Rs.64 lakhs in October, as compared with a debit balance of Rs.1,98 lakhs in September, and a debit balance of Rs. 400 lakhs a year ago. During the seven months ending October there was a favourable balance amounting to Rs.26,70 lakhs, as against Rs. 8,77 lakhs in the corresponding period of the preceding year.

The share of the United Kingdom in imports fell from 61.5 per cent. in October, 1922, to 53 per cent. in October, 1923, while in exports her share rose from 28.8 to 31.2 per cent. The shares of Germany, Japan, and the United States during October, 1923, were respectively 4.6, 6, and 4 per cent. under imports, and 5.8, 4.5, and 10.4 per cent. under exports.

The tonnage of vessels entered into British India and cleared outwards with cargoes from and to foreign countries and British Possessions during October amounted respectively to 581,000 and 610,000, as against 551,000 and 610,000 in September, 1923, and 542,000 and 581,000 a year ago. The tonnage entered into and cleared from British India during the seven months April to October was 3,836,000 and 4,516,000 respectively, as compared with 3,838,000 and 4,249,000 in the same period last year.

The output of the Bulgarian coal mines in October totalled 95,875 tons.

The Imperial Bank of India has raised its rate of discount from 7 to 8 per cent.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Rather Firm Tone

The Alexandria Commercial Company in its report for the week ended December 28 states :—

Since our last report the futures market, with Christmas holidays intervening, has been open only three days. Contrary to past experience of the period between Christmas and New Year holidays, our market has shown a rather firm tone during this week, and prices have made an appreciable advance. The causes of this firmness are the renewed strength of the New York market, where January quotations have again touched 36 c., and also fairly large sales to England and the Continent on the eve of the holidays. The drop which we experienced of late has eliminated from the market the weak speculative element, and it has also caused much of the cotton weakly held to be hedged with futures; the consequence is that the market is now in a much sounder position, and much more apt to be affected by any demand from abroad. At the third December tender 11,250-krs. dockets were issued. The daily arrivals from up-country continue to be fairly heavy, and we expect that the total at the end of the season will not be far short of 6½ million kantars, although the official estimates are all below six millions. Shipments so far this year are about 300,000 kantars more than the corresponding period last year, and the total supply this year is about 7¼ millions, of which over 3⅜ millions are already shipped. The total shipments last year were 7⅛ millions. The week's arrivals amount to 220,854 krs., against export 251,560 krs.; the stock stands at 2,147,592 krs.

Spot.—Minet et Bassal has only been open three days this week owing to holidays, but a fair business has been done and sales amount to about 9,500 B/s, of which we estimate 5,800 B/s Sakel and 3,700 B/s Uppers, with a few bales of White. There has been rather more enquiry from spinners than was expected at holiday time. Arrivals continue on a good scale, but exports are larger than last week and the stock shows a small decrease but is still over two million kantars.

Sakellarides.—All grades have been dealt in, and once again the medium qualities have attracted most attention. Prices of spot against contracts are generally a little easier, with the exception of good fair and the grades above good, which are without change.

Uppers.—Business has been done in all grades. Prices of spot against contracts are firm, and inclined to harden for F.G.F. and above; for good fair they are without change, but for the grades below good fair they are rather easier.

Brown and Pilion have been neglected, and no business is reported. Quotations of spot against contracts are generally unchanged.

White has also been neglected, and only a few bales have been done. Quotations of spot against contracts are inclined to ease with the exception of good fair, which is without change.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Market Steady.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended January 2 :—

Egyptian Spot.—The present report covers a period of eight business days, which have been broken up by the Christmas and New Year holidays. Just prior to the holidays a much better feeling had become apparent, and, as all markets showed a disposition towards comparative steadiness, this has been well maintained until to-day. Reports from Manchester continued in quite an optimistic vein, and, although no large volume of business has been transacted, the tone has kept good, and prices, following the lead of the futures market, showed at noon to-day a considerable gain on balance. To-day, however, an easier tone has developed, and business is slow in maturing, but it is generally expected that the trade will begin to buy again somewhere about the beginning of this month, barring unforeseen complications, of course. Few mills, it is believed, have bought beyond March, and it is common knowledge that several of the big concerns have large purchases yet to make before they can count on their season's requirements being secure. The spot demand here has been very patchy, and new features are lacking. The cotton chiefly in request has been Sakellaridis "50 on to 50 off," and at the moment there seems to be a plentiful supply of this quality. A fair business has taken place in Uppers at from 50 to 100 off contracts, and the quotation of Good Upper has hardened relatively to the other grades. A good business has been done in White Sudan, a line of 600 bales being moved on one day. Brown, White, and Low cottons have been comparatively neglected, and c.i.f. business has been quiet. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending December 28 were returned as 13,533 bales, and the average since August 1 last now stands at over 9,000 bales. Estimated sales 1,800 Egyptians and 1,050 bales Sudan. Quotations of Upper showed a rise (at noon to-day) of 170 points since our last report, with "Good" exceptionally 185, and "Fair" 120 points higher. Sakellaridis showed a rise of 175 points, with the exception of "Fair," which is 135 points, and "Good Fair," which is 185 points higher. In Brown, all grades are raised 170 points, with the exception of "Fair," which is 120 points higher. Fully Good Fair Sakellaridis to-day 24.50d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Considerable Inquiry for Cloth.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended January 5 states :—

As is usual, this market reopened after the holidays very quietly, and not much business has been transacted, although towards the end of the week a certain volume of inquiry was experienced, which has produced a somewhat more cheerful feeling in the market. Raw cotton has again fluctuated rather widely, and, as has been frequently mentioned, stability in this section would be of very great assistance to the manufacturing side of the trade.

Yarn.—Orders have been few, and the position of spinners has probably not improved from the week's stoppage at Christmas, stocks of yarn being probably as large now as they were before the holidays. Egyptian spinnings remain fairly steady.

Cloth.—In the closing days of the week a considerable inquiry was received from India, chiefly for dhooties and mulls. Generally speaking the prices offered were too low, but the inquiry is accepted as evidence that supplies are needed, and it is hoped that, given reasonable steadiness in raw cotton rates, business will materialise a little later. Very few orders have been put through for the Near East and Egypt.

Raw Cotton.—The Liverpool market was closed on Monday and Tuesday last for the New Year holiday. Quotations were unchanged on Wednesday, but on Thursday a fall of 94 points took place in "spot," whilst yesterday there was a rise of 31 points. Closing prices yesterday were as follows :—American fully middling 20.43d., Egyptian fully good fair 23.60d.

The imports of coal into Alexandria for the eleven months ended November 30 amounted to 699,530 tons.

The production of the Indo-Burma Oilfields (1920) for November totalled 4,316 barrels, being 2.850.4 barrels from Yenanma field and 1,456.6 barrels from Padaukpin field.

Negotiations are in progress between the Yugoslav Government and a Basle bank with a view to issuing a loan of 10,000,000 Swiss francs, which will be used for public works and for the water supply of Belgrade.

A Reuter message from Teheran, dated January 4, states that the Cabinet Council has passed certain articles in the passport laws providing, inter alia, that a foreigner having less than 100 tomans in his possession will not be allowed to enter Persia, and that a foreigner leaving Persia must obtain a permit, failing which he is liable to be stopped at the frontier.

Lloyds Bank announces that the address of its Eastern Department is now 77, Lombard Street, E.C.3. As a result of the acquisition of the businesses of Messrs. Cox and Co. and Messrs. Henry S. King and Co. (including Messrs. King, King, and Co. and Messrs. King, Hamilton, and Co.), Lloyds Bank now possesses eleven branches in India and Burma and nine in Egypt. It has thus secured direct representation in the East, together with the widespread connections of the firms mentioned.

Company Meeting.

LAND BANK OF EGYPT.

The following is a translation of the report of the Land Bank of Egypt for the year ended September 30 last, which was presented at the annual meeting held at Alexandria on December 4 :—

The year ended September 30 last has been of special interest for the company on account of financial transactions of an exceptional character, which are dealt with later on, although we have by no means neglected our main raison d'être—mortgage loans with statutory guarantees of security. Within the scope of our ordinary disposable funds, and wherever possible giving preference to old clients, we have concluded 157 loans and 34 sales for an amount of £E402,616.085, which added to £E110,184.561 due by purchasers on the price of real estate expropriated, and loans or sales in progress, gives a total of £E3,773,306.284. As a consequence of the temporarily embarrassed situation in which the small landowner has found himself after two difficult years, annual payments to be collected stand at September 30 at £E372,578.916, against £E336,679.381 last year. They include £E126,414.350 arrears of previous years, and £E246,164.566 applying to the current year. In the same way our property, which stood at September 30, 1922, at £E50,784.451, has risen to £E101,086.052, despite an active business in reselling ten estates and eleven lots of land for building purposes having been disposed of for an amount of £E48,716.681. The cotton season which has commenced has brought about an appreciable improvement in respect of these two important matters, and encourages us to hope for more considerable collections and for liquidation of estates at sufficiently remunerative prices. The amortisations which we propose comprise the ordinary features—movables, brokerage on mortgage loans, expenses of exploitation of land, the real property of the company, making a total of £E10,526.316. We also place to the provision for payments in arrears a sum of £E3,589.391, and £E10,000 added to the amount which is intended to cover the risks on loans and eventual losses on resales of estate. A special amortisation is proposed of an amount of £E18,494.071, intended to extinguish various issue charges, notably the stamp duty payable to the English Treasury, and £E16,582.801, the balance of various minor expenses, on a new class of 5 per cent. bonds, figuring in our balance-sheet at par for the sum of £E829,140, created as a result of financial realisations which demand some words of explanation on our part. We propose to raise the dividend, and to make it 12s. 6d. on the ordinary shares and £6 on the founders' shares, carrying forward £E8,276.729 for the former and £E4,596.269 for the latter.

In last year's report we referred to certain transactions of repurchase on the Bourse of our 4 per cent. bonds, which, we think it necessary to recall here, are payable in Paris in French currency, and in other places indicated for payment at the rate of exchange for sight in Paris. The extent of the repurchases on the Bourse was necessarily limited because of the distribution of the shares among so many small French holders, and the difficulty of reaching them. Your board, given full authority by the extraordinary meetings of December 5 and 21 confirming the resolutions already taken previously, extended its repurchases, and with that aim in view, at the same time using our disposable funds, has concluded an agreement with an important English insurance company which will enable us, in profiting by the advantages of the exchange, to repurchase a large part of the 4 per cents. and to replace them by 5 per cent. bonds as indicated above, and that without the intervention, and consequently the remuneration, of any intermediary. The transaction has been conducted in two phases : in the first, which began in January last, we have to the extent of our resources in francs of about 18,000,000 repaid to the public the 4 per cent. bonds presented at the rate of 466 francs, the price of subscription of our different issues. This first attempt having produced encouraging results, we have been able, thanks to the support of the English insurance company, to continue our repurchases on a larger scale. In the second phase, which commenced on October 1, with the provision that holders could present their shares before expiration, the price of repayment was raised to the parity of 500 francs, increased by the interest running at October 1. A certain number of holders were repaid before September 30 last, and we have been able to incorporate in our balance-sheet the results already obtained at that date.

While safeguarding our rights for the future we have considered that we ought to have a free hand with regard to our repurchases, given the real advantages which French holders find in the exchange, which enables them to obtain a rate of interest more remunerative than that provided by our bonds. At the date of the closing of our accounts, the repurchases added to those of the previous year, together making a total of 65,304 shares, including the regular amortisations, have left us profits which enable us to liquidate wholly not only the item "Premiums and Charges" of £E570,522.203 included among our liabilities in previous balance-sheets for our 3½ per cent. and 4 per cent. bonds, but further to realise the amortisation of £E97,908.812 on the premiums of our new 5 per cent. series, leaving an important balance to our credit. These operations so happily undertaken on October 1 pursue a satisfactory course, and since the closing of the accounts the number of shares so repurchased amounts to about 36,500. Your board, in presenting these advantageous results obtained during the past year, do not doubt that you will adopt its views, and support its proposals, which are made to safeguard the future in the best interest of the company. We have the pleasant task of rendering to the staff, always faithful and devoted, the most sincere thanks for their support.

Profit and Loss Account.

The receipts of the year arising from interest on mortgage loans, short term advances, etc., have been £E400,047.334. The service of the bonds, general expenses, fiscal taxes paid or due to the French Government, and various redemptions we propose to you, which stand at £E42,609.778, absorb a total sum of £E235,922.455, bearing profits to be distributed of £E164,124.879. From that sum there has first to be deducted the statutory 5 per cent. in favour of our 195,000 shares, £E47,531.250, and there remains to be divided £E116,593.629. In accordance with our statutes, 10 per cent. is placed to the statutory reserve £E11,659.362, and 10 per cent. goes to the board of directors £E11,659.362, £E23,318.724, leaving £E93,274.905 ; 70 per cent. to the shares £E65,292.433, to which has to be added the amount brought forward from the year 1921-22 £E14,281.171, making £E79,573.604. We propose to you to give out of this sum to the 195,000 shares 7s. 6d. per share, £E71,296.875, which, added to the statutory interest of 5 per cent. already mentioned, will represent a total dividend of 12s. 6d. per share. The carry forward for the shares will thus be £E8,276.729. An interim dividend of 3s. having been paid on June 15, it will remain to pay a dividend of 9s. 6d. per share. The 30 per cent. belonging to the founders' shares represents £E27,982.472, to which has to be added the amount brought forward from the year 1921-22, £E5,863.797. We propose to distribute a dividend of £6 on each founders' share, and to carry forward £E4,596.269.

The general meeting unanimously (1) approved the accounts and balance-sheet for the year ended September 30, 1923, and gave the directors their discharge for their administration. (2) Approved the division of profits proposed by the directors, and fixed the dividends as follows :—12s. 6d. on the ordinary shares, £6 on the founders' shares. An interim dividend of 3s. per ordinary share having been paid on June 15, it will remain to pay as a final settlement for the year 1921-22 9s. 6d. per share. (3) Decided to carry forward £E8,276.729, or 214,561.78 francs, for the ordinary shares, and £E4,596.269, or 119,151.50 francs, for the founders' shares. (4) Re-elected MM. R. Abdy, P. Zarifi, and Ed. Bourre, the retiring directors. (5) Nominated as auditors MM. Frantz Sofio, H. Pougin, and A. Ferren. (6) Fixed the directors' fees at £5 per meeting.

COMPANY NOTES AND REPORTS.

South Behar Railway.

The report of the South Behar Railway Company for 1923 states that after paying a dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum for the half-year ended December 31, 1922, a balance remained of £9,239, which with the amount received from the Secretary of State for India for the half-year to June 30, 1923, and other receipts, less interest on debenture stock and sundry outgoings, left £18,627, subject to corporation tax. An interim dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum was paid, leaving £9,137 to carry forward. Adding £15,000 received from the Secretary of State for India for the half-year to December 31, 1923, and other receipts, less interest on debenture stock and sundry outgoings, there remains £18,503, subject to corporation tax. The directors recommend a dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum for the half-year to stockholders registered December 31, leaving £9,014 to be carried forward. Meeting, 25, Buckingham Palace Road, S.W., January 14, 2.30 p.m.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Belgrade Conference.

The attempt of a few days ago to make European affairs hinge, as it were, on the Little Entente is now being discouraged. The future of the Continent is, after all, not to be determined at the two days' conference in Belgrade. Czecho-Slovakia's treaty with France has been received in Roumania, if not in Yugoslavia as well, with as little enthusiasm as in certain other quarters, and Dr. Benesh, who arrives in England this week, is understood to be anxious to prove the innocuous character of the pact with France by inviting the conclusion of a similar agreement between Great Britain and Czecho-Slovakia. Accordingly, the risk of Roumania and Yugoslavia sacrificing their real interests, which lie in a united Balkan Peninsula, to Central European entanglements, has for the present been avoided. Whatever party is in power in England, we may hope, will see through the specious argument in regard to the upholding of treaties. The treaties which have followed the Great War are not an end in themselves, but ought to be merely the means to the establishment of lasting peace and to the upbuilding of Europe. In whatever respect they fall short of this goal they are defective, and ought, to that extent, to be revised or remodelled. Most certainly they are not to be torn up by the defeated nations; but it would be folly for the victors to penalise themselves by perpetuating any treaty clause that can be shown to be injurious to their own interests and to the interests of Europe as a whole. Such, however, would be the effect of the provisions of the treaty between France and Czecho-Slovakia, if they were to be embodied in any general arrangement binding all the Powers.

Italy and Yugoslavia.

A treaty between Yugoslavia and Italy, which, it was announced at Belgrade, is on the verge of being concluded, stands in a different category from a Franco-Czecho-Slovakian alliance. There have been a number of points in dispute between the Italians and Yugoslavs, some of which might ultimately bring the two countries to the point of war, and until all are settled, relations between them can never be wholly satisfactory. The terms of the Italo-Yugoslav treaty have not yet been made public; but it is stated that they will contain no reference to Fiume, which is the subject of a separate convention. The new treaty may be regarded as a counterblast to the intentions held at least in one quarter regarding the Franco-Czecho-Slovakian Agreement, although it will be cited as a natural corollary to the policy which Czecho-Slovakia has mapped out for the Little Entente of close collaboration with all countries interested in the general European situation. A pact exclusively for peace purposes, except as between countries with strained relations, has the effect in present circumstances of gilding the lily of the League of Nations. On the other hand, any alliance specifically aimed at third parties and embodying the policy of the Big Stick drives other countries to seek protection, and so perpetuates the principle of armed camps which brought Europe to the Great War.

Veni, Vidi, Cessi.

M. Venizelos has once more become Prime Minister of Greece. The post this time has been none of his own seeking. Conditions in Greece compelled him to overrule his decision not to return to the country, and now, in turn, they have forced him to assume the reins of government in spite of his reiterated statements that he would not take this step. As a result of recent events, the Venizelists had ranged themselves in two groups—Republicans, with M. Roussos as the most prominent among them, Monarchists under the leadership of General Danglis. The latter found himself unable to form a Ministry; it was not considered politic that M. Roussos should be invited to undertake the task. There was no one apart from M. Venizelos who had the least chance of bringing the two sections together. As he had set himself to restore unity in the nation, it was obvious that he must begin by uniting his own party, and to do this effectually he had to accept the responsibilities of leadership. Now that he has put his hand to the plough, it is to be hoped that M. Venizelos will give up all thought of turning back to Paris. No small part of the ills from which Greece is suffering can be associated with

Digitized by Google

M. Venizelos's absence from Greece—on important business for the country, it is true—when the administration had to be left to other hands not sufficiently qualified for the task. Now that the veteran statesman has accepted office again his proper place is in Greece.

Greece and Recognition.

M. Venizelos's Ministry, as far as is known, is drawn exclusively from his own followers. In spite of the action of extremists, the Royalists as a whole will probably acquiesce in a Government under the personal direction of M. Venizelos, which sets itself to lead the country to a happier frame of mind and to restore its prosperity. They are far less likely to acquiesce in a Liberal Government under another leader who has neither the prestige nor the ability of M. Venizelos. If this is so, there is a further cogent argument why the new Prime Minister should dedicate himself afresh to service in Greece and abandon the idea of serving for a period and then leaving the country. In this connection we would emphasise the difference between giving full recognition to M. Venizelos's peculiar position in Greece and action tending to ignore the rest of the Greek people. The mistake made by the Allied Powers in the past was to lend themselves to a policy which gave no thought to Greece apart from M. Venizelos. In the long run this policy was harmful both to the statesman and to the nation. To avoid a similar mistake in the future it would be well if Great Britain's recognition could be given in such a way that it constitutes recognition of the Sovereign, and consequently of his Government of the time being, rather than that it should be recognition of the Government because M. Venizelos happens to be head of it, and that recognition of the Sovereign should follow from the other. The point may seem a small one; but we believe that the adoption of the correct course by the British Government will play its part in the healing of the political wounds in Greece that we all wish to see carried into effect.

The Egyptian Elections.

Zaghloul Pasha has won an overwhelming victory in the General Election in Egypt, and is assured of a majority of over a hundred in a Chamber of two hundred Deputies. Such a "landslide" exceeded expectations, and may be regarded as a tribute to the superior energy and organisation of the Zaghloulists. The position in the Egyptian Chamber will be on a par with that of the Turkish Parliament, but with the important difference that in Cairo the Government, with its supporters, will be in closer touch with realities than its Turkish counterpart is in Angora. There will, therefore, be no need for pessimism or uneasiness until the new régime has shown that it is bent on trouble. Ardent Zaghloulists will claim that their hero has won in his long struggle against Great Britain; but the truer perspective will show that the real issue was whether the arena should be a constitutional or an unconstitutional one, and that as soon as the British contention of a constitutional arena was accepted, the struggle became one between Egyptians rather than of Egyptians against British. The equivalent of a Botha or Smuts in Egypt would be an Egyptian statesman bent on advancing the interests of his country in close co-operation with the British Empire, and this co-operation Zaghloul Pasha or any other Prime Minister can have for the asking.

Afghanistan.

It is satisfactory to learn that the Ajab gang, which is responsible for several of the recent outrages on the North-West Frontier, has surrendered to the Afghan Government. The prolonged impunity enjoyed by the murderers was proving a severe tax on British patience, and as the weeks and months passed without their capture it was inevitable that doubt should be entertained as to the sincerity of the Afghan attempts to arrest the gang. A communication from the India Government to Kabul may well have had the effect of spurring the Afghan Government to more resolute effort, and it has been followed in a comparatively short time by the news of the gang's surrender. It now remains that the outlaws should speedily be brought to justice, care being taken that none of them in the meantime escapes. Soviet Russia has done its best to represent Great Britain as attempting to interfere in the internal affairs of Afghanistan, but when it is realised that Great Britain remains quite unperturbed by the Ameer's reform schemes, or by the means by which they are carried out, and is concerned only to see that encouragement is not given to lawlessness on the Afghan-Indian frontier, the protests of the Soviet may perhaps be valued at their proper worth in Kabul. As Afghanistan's chief drawback is her inexperience in world affairs, it may not be a bad thing in the long run that the Afghans should be brought into touch with other nationalities besides Britons and Russians. We must be sadly lacking in confidence in ourselves if we cannot look forward without anxiety to the day when, having gained their experience, the Afghans will decide that, after all, there is a good deal to be said in favour of British methods and standards.

The New Governor of the Punjab.

The announcement that Sir William Malcolm Hailey has been chosen to succeed Sir Edward Maclagan as Governor of the Punjab disposes of a question which has kept the quidnuncs busy for some time past. The position, once so coveted, has at the moment comparatively few attractions, owing to the attitude taken up by a section of the Sikh community, and the intrusion into politics of sectarian feeling in its most uncompromising form; the final solution of the difficulties is not yet in sight, and the idea of an unusual, or even a spectacular, appointment had apparently taken a firm hold in India. The idea has not been realised, for the post falls to the most distinguished of the Punjab civilians now in India, and we hope the result will show that there was no necessity for special measures. The local situation is undoubtedly awkward, but it is better than it was, and we believe that the Governor-designate possesses the qualifications required to complete Sir Edward Maclagan's arduous work.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

The Anti-Labour Party.

Fear of Labour does not seem to decrease as the dissolution of the Conservatives approaches. Stocks are slumping, the dollar is going against us, and, in general, the conduct of financiers seems to indicate impending disaster. In manifest desperation the craven are looking round for a rallying cry; but so far only temperance has been found! How bankrupt this anti-Labour agitation is of all intellectual foundation may thus painfully be seen. There are still being made attempts to prevent the accession of Labour to supreme power, but there is not much probability of their succeeding. Labour will certainly make enough mistakes, Heaven knows, but the Conservatives must rely on some surer basis than this to return to power. At present they have undirected keenness and little else. If one may judge by certain unexpected signs, Labour in office will be a very different party from what it was in opposition. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald is already preaching friendship with France, and all round a marked moderation in the speeches of the more responsible of the Labour leaders is observable. From all precedents, the Labour Party in office ought, therefore, to achieve precisely nothing. And so the world wags on.

An Affair of Conscience.

Last week at the House of Commons one of those strange aberrations to which the Labour Party seems particularly prone was indulged in the form of a dinner given to members who at some time or other had been imprisoned for their political or religious beliefs. It was marked by the blessing of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and the absence of any pressman whose code of life did not include an unqualified admiration for conscientious objectors, pacifists, and the rest of that speckled band we know so well. What these ex-prisoners found to say for themselves can easily be imagined: they were always the most communicative of men, and no reputable journal has really suffered from its inability to report their futile self-glorifications. It is this sort of thing more than anything else which will "get up the backs" of the country, which has not degenerated so far as to worship at the feet of those whose conscience impels them to work against the State. We are slack, admittedly. but this kind of procedure will not indefinitely be stomached. There is, of course, plenty of patriotism and loyalty in the Labour Party, but if it is going to be obscured by such lamentable manifestations as this, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's tenure of office is to be short.

The L24.

In moving contrast to the conduct of the abovementioned handful of Parliamentary gallants came the shocking news of the disaster to the submarine L24. The fate of the sailors who went down in this vessel seems to have touched the nation as scarcely anything since the War. How it all happened no one appears quite to know, and the event has been accepted as similar events were accepted during the War—that is, in the "carry on" spirit. Pride in our Services is just as high as ever it was, and admiration for those whose lives are more or less in perennial danger as surely unqualified. No Labour Party will ever eradicate that.

Our British Greens.

It is not of golf, or bowls, or cabbages that I am about to speak, but of a new political party. At the next election there is to be a Rural Party in the field. The programme of this party is as yet a little vague, consisting of certain demands upon the State, immediate financial assistance, control of imports, and so on. It further proposes the self-help of agriculture by means of such things as credit facilities, improved transport, development of economic research, and so forth.

How much ice a Peasant Party in Britain would cut it is difficult to say, but of its desirability there is no question. There is no safer bulwark against a Red Party than a Green Party. The Labour Party now has a splendid chance of showing that it is ahead of the other two parties, which did little for the agriculture of Britain; but Labour is born of industrialism, and there is not much hope of its helping a declining industry.

The Charm of Prison Life.

A curious case was reported a day or two ago of an ex-prisoner wishing to return to gaol on the ground that he so much enjoyed there the lectures of Bevan and Bottomley. Prison life must indeed be fascinating if two such masters are allowed to lecture to their brother misdemeanants. One is reminded, when reading of the educative value of these two men, of the story of a famous self-taught newspaper proprietor who was supposed to belittle the worth of education. A certain Harrovian once called upon him and was told of the end of Bevan; whereupon the Harrovian referred him to the story of Bottomley.

A Railway Strike.

One was getting quite accustomed to the annual threat of a railway strike, though the habit had not become so ingrained that one noticed that this year's, if one may call it so, did not come at its usual time of Christmas, but during the last week-end. It is this time a question of one union—the Association of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen—against the companies. The companies proposed to reduce wages next week, and everybody thought that the proposition was accepted, when, lo and behold! one Mr. Bromley says that there will rather be a strike next week-end.

But, happily for the public, such a strike would, it appears, seriously prejudice the plans of the official Labour Party, and the latest news is to the effect that the affair will somehow be patched up. Into the rights and wrongs of a strike it is seldom wise to enter: no one side is ever quite indefensible. But one can definitely express disapproval of the unfair attempts made by the meticulous anti-Labourites to put forward this threat of a strike as justification for the prevention of a Labour Govenment.

Influenza.

Ever since the War we seem to have been suffering from various forms of influenza. First it was the eyes, then the throat, then the nose, that were affected: the present invasion is striking dismay into the stomach. We used to put it down to loss of resisting power owing to the privations experienced during the War, but that theory is no longer tenable, for the pernicious disease is attacking successfully the fittest people.

So far, no great attention has been paid to influenza research, but its occurrence is so frequent nowadays that we may shortly expect an extensive advertising campaign (the "£5,000 for 2s. 6d." sort) designed to stamp out the country's worst pest.

Faith Healing.

In spite of the advances which psychological research, Christian Science, and similar studies have made in recent years, one was not aware that spiritual healing was so widely recognised by clerical and medical opinion until the report was issued last week upon "the use with prayer of the laying on of hands, of the unction of the sick, and other spiritual means of healing." We are living in a material age, and the ordinary man is inclined to look askance at the short cuts to health which certain eccentrics have for long been wont to practise. But the longer view sees the value underlying the claims of the faith healers, and perceives the fact that science is in many ways confirming the now neglected truths of mediæval religion. There is nothing extravagant in this report, for it states definitely that religious treatment of bodily illness must be correlated with other forms of treatment. In short, what this report recommends has not only scriptural authority, but also medical sanction. Cases are not common, but they are sufficiently numerous, of devotional treatment either curing the patient or at least giving him the grace to bear his illness manfully, to warrant the wide publicity that has been given to this report.

The Weather.

Last week Londoners were as happy as they possibly could be, and all owing to the weather. From morn to night they groused! Snow in London is a pleasant sight, but an unhappy experience, for the streets soon become impossible. I have never known worse slush in town than we had on Thursday; the roads were literally running in water. On all the suburban lines the excuse was made by our hustling railway combines to postpone the arrival of trains, or else to cancel them altogether, the while the poor passenger shivered and cursed.

But out of London it was rather glorious, and the tobogganing was fairly good. One forgets the delays in the trains, the slush of the Strand, and the splash of the omnibuses in the joys of a really good toboggan spill at night—which, of course, was what the more philosophic part of London did.

Cup-tie Football.

The victory of the Corinthians against Blackburn Rovers in the F.A. Cup on Saturday will do an immense amount of good, and it has been applauded on all sides. For too long the Soccer professionals have been infinitely superior to the amateurs, and the belief was springing up that this would always be so. To find, therefore, that amateurs are capable of staying the professionals' pace is most gratifying. It is, unfortunately, too much to say that it will improve the tone of Association football, for that has already sunk to an impossible depth, and there is also a vast betting industry attached to it. But the success of the Corinthians must do good to those schools which have, through very trying times, remained faithful to Soccer—Winchester, Repton, Charterhouse, Shrewsbury, Malvern, and the rest.

Theatres.

The theatres seem at the moment to have got stuck in one of those barren bogs which are so frequently seen in London. Most of the plays now running are of the light or sentimental type—revueish or Barryish. Still, Lee White has come back to us, and next month the D'Oyly Carte people are coming to Princes, so that there are very definite compensations. The "seasonal" things—"The Blue Bird," "Treasure Island," and so on—must perhaps first be cleared out of the way before we shall get anything really of importance. As it is, a week's theatre-going and you could exhaust London's possibilities.

The New Air Service.

The agreement recently concluded between the Air Council and various commercial concerns to combine a civil air service to be used throughout Europe with a reserve force which may be used in case of war by the Air Ministry should, one thinks, satisfy even our Lord Birkenheads and all the other people who are alarmed at the size of the French Air Force. Into the details of this scheme, which creates a monopoly financed by the Government, I am not competent to enter. I should have thought the prospects of a profit-making commercial air service remote, as also of any considerable popularity on the part of the public for travelling by air. But manifestly the promoters of the scheme are looking ahead, and science does work wonders. . . .

New Business Quarters.

For some time one had wondered what was going to happen to all the huge new offices round about Kingsway, but now it is obvious that they are becoming tenanted. People are moving thither from the City, and Kingsway will soon rival the City and Westminster as a business quarter. It is probably the rising generation, which likes to have plenty of light in the room and a place outside to park cars, abhors dust, and so on, which has decided on this move; but one cannot imagine that the old pre-War, pre-telephone, prejudiced generation will disapprove of it.

ALTER EGO.

The appointment of Mr. Gilbert MacKereth, D.S.O., M.C., to be Vice-Consul at Fez is notified in the London Gazette of January 8.

Mr. J. E. A. C. Monck-Mason, lately H.M. Vice-Consul at Suez, has been appointed H.M. Vice-Consul at Skoplje, where he has taken up his duties as from December 29 last.

The King has approved the appointment of Sir William Malcolm Hailey, K.C.S.I., C.I.E., to be Governor of the Punjab and its dependencies, in succession to Sir Edward Douglas Maclagan, K.C.S.I., K.C.I.E., whose tenure of office will expire next May.

The engagement is announced of Princess Nadejda, second daughter of ex-King Ferdinand of Bulgaria, with Duke Albert Eugene of Wurtemberg. The marriage will be celebrated very shortly, and Prince Cyril, younger brother of Princess Nadejda, who has been spending Christmas with King Boris, is leaving for Coburg to join the Princess.

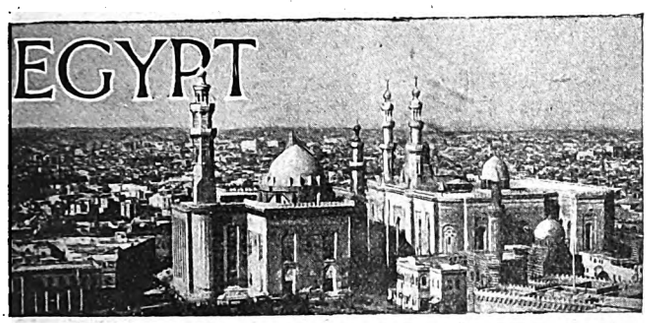
The Near and Middle East.

From Our Own Correspondents.



Cairo, January 6.

Prince Arthur's Visit.

Prince Arthur of Connaught has had a very busy time since his arrival here at midday on Thursday. In the afternoon of the same day he called on King Fuad at Abdin Palace, then left with Viscount Allenby for Ekiad, where the Residency shoot is situated, spent the forenoon of Friday duck shooting, and lunched, with the rest of the party, at the house of Amin Pasha Ghali, returning to Cairo in the late afternoon. In the evening there was a dinner at the Residency to the local Diplomatic Corps, while yesterday Prince Arthur, the High Commissioner, and Viscountess Allenby were at Gezira races. In the evening another official dinner was given at the Residency, this time to senior British officers of the garrison and senior British officials in the Egyptian Government's service. This morning Prince Arthur moved to the Semiramis Hotel, where he will stay for a period not yet settled. It is expected that he will pay a visit to Upper Egypt before he returns to England. He left the Residency, of course, on account of the High Commissioner and Lady Allenby's departure to-morrow evening to the Sudan.

Election Amenities.

Party rivalries become more embittered as the date of the final elections draws nearer. The chief political happening of the week has been an exchange of open letters between Abdel Khalek Sarwat Pasha, who was Minister of the Interior in Adly Pasha Yegher's Cabinet, and Premier of the succeeding Ministry, and Saad Pasha Zaghloul. Sarwat Pasha took the opportunity afforded by the recent appeal for unity issued by a number of members of the Royal Family to address to Saad Pasha an invitation to a public debate, at which the jury should be composed of Princes, ex-Ministers, and other public men, to hear from Zaghloul Pasha the charges which he has so often, in political speeches, made against Sarwat Pasha's honesty and loyalty to his country. The jury, after hearing Sarwat Pasha's reply, would give its decision, and thus an end might be put to the feud which the Prince's manifesto deplored. Zaghloul Pasha's reply refuses the invitation with contemptuous scorn. Sarwat Pasha, says the Wafd leader, is neither a national nor a party leader—simply an individual who enslaved his country for the sake of British favours, who imprisoned and sentenced to death the patriots who opposed him, and who carried his knavery to the extreme limits of deliberate lying. Let Sarwat Pasha seek a newspaper or a public platform, if he can find readers or listeners, to air his views; the tribunal of honourable men which he proposes must be reserved for those worthy to appear before it. The letter of Saad Pasha is, even for its writer, who is a master of abuse, a wonderful achievement of venomous invective, exposing to the world the intense hatred of the Wafd leader for a man whose brilliant abilities are unquestionable, but who refuses to bow to the overpowering megalomania of Zaghloul Pasha. It is very improbable that Sarwat Pasha expected his invitation to be accepted. It is known that he has prepared a political speech of a sensational nature, and that he has been asked not to deliver it on account of its being likely further to poison the already sulphurously thick political atmosphere. Now, by having drawn from Zaghloul Pasha another typically vituperative reply, Sarwat Pasha is in a position to answer those who urge him to silence, that the Wafd leader's latest outburst compels a rejoinder and the production of new facts calculated to exonerate Sarwat Pasha from charges of pro-British intrigue.

Saleh Bey Enan's Career.

It is expected that, either to-day or to-morrow, Saleh Bey Enan, now Assistant Under-Secretary (and Acting Under-Secretary) of State for Finance, will be definitely appointed Under-Secretary of State. Saleh Bey has had a remarkable career. After taking an engineering degree at King's College, London, he was appointed to the Irrigation service, and was stationed in Upper Egypt. In the Irrigation service Saleh Bey did not get on at all, not through any fault of his own, but because his seniors and colleagues did not understand him, for he is a man of much independence of character and of an absolute fearlessness in saying what he thinks. Things eventually became so difficult at the Ministry of Public Works that he resigned from the Government service. In 1916 he was reappointed, this time to the Ministry of Finance, and there his career has been as brilliant as in the Ministry of Public Works it was difficult. Saleh Bey is extremely popular with the British officials of his Ministry, and particularly with Mr. Patterson, the lately appointed Financial Adviser, who has the highest opinion of his abilities. Indeed, the fact that Mr. Patterson, who is extraordinarily well liked by Egyptian officials, thinks that Saleh Bey is the right man for the post to which he has been appointed, has done more than anything else to allay the discontent naturally aroused by the promotion of so young and com-

A Remarkable Case.

A very unusual case will come on for hearing in the Cairo Native Court of First Instance this week, when there will be heard an appeal against sentence of imprisonment passed upon an Egyptian named Sirry and his wife, formerly a Scotswoman, for acting as receivers of stolen property. The evidence heard in the Summary Court which passed the sentences showed that the Sirrys had for some time been actively co-operating with a burglar gang. The interesting part of the affair is, however, that Sirry was a naturalised British subject and served in the British Army in the War. On these grounds he has contested the jurisdiction of the Native Courts, and the matter has been referred to the Foreign Office. Apparently—on what grounds I have not yet been able to ascertain—it has been decided that Sirry lost his British nationality some time ago. There will be a British judge on the Bench of the Native Court when the case comes on for hearing on Thursday, and the aspects of the matter, which are now obscure, will doubtless be cleared up.

A Journalistic Broil.

For some time past one of the French newspapers published in Cairo has taken a very active part in local politics, acting as a French mouthpiece of the Zaghloulist executive. The other day an Arabic newspaper opposed to Saad Pasha took the French organ to task for interfering in Egyptian internal affairs, and asked why this interference was tolerated by the French Minister in Cairo, since the French journal was known to be officially connected with the French Agency. The French Minister yesterday issued a statement to the effect that the paper in question was not the official organ of the Agency, but this denial has not quite cleared the air, for it is a matter of common knowledge that the French newspaper concerned is paid a substantial subsidy by the French Government, and the Arabic Press is asking for what purpose this money is spent, if not to secure publication of the French official viewpoint. The matter is a trivial one and of no interest excepting to the parties concerned, save in so far as it justifies the action—frequently criticised—of the British authorities here in refusing to subsidise, and thereby to control, any local newspaper. Though there are undoubted advantages in having a means of putting forward the official point of view, these are certainly counterbalanced by the fact that, once a newspaper is known to be officially supported, everything it says is judged to have official inspiration, with, sometimes, unfortunate results.

Government Office Hours.

The decision to keep Government offices open in the afternoons has not long remained in force. From the first day exceptions began to be made; very soon the number of departments exempted from compliance formed the majority, and now the whole thing has been countermanded, and heads of departments have been empowered to make the best arrangements they can to suit their department's special circumstances. Thus is terminated a scheme the potential advantages of which were very doubtful, and which certainly caused much hardship to officials of the lower grades, living far out in the suburbs, who have ordered their whole lives on the basis of a day's work which finishes at 2 p.m.

Egyptian Football.

The past week has been a notable one in the local sporting world, for Egypt has been visited by the Hakoah football team from Vienna, which, playing a side representative of Alexandria on Tuesday, won by three goals to one, and on Friday drew with a Cairo eleven, each side scoring one goal. The Hakoah team has many excellent performances to its credit, including a recent victory over West Ham United, and the eleven which has come to Egypt includes nine players who have been chosen to represent Austria in the Olympic games. The matches have, therefore, provided a basis for estimating the chances of the Egyptian side which is to compete in the next Olympic contests. It cannot be said that the two games have given much encouragement to local hopes, for at both matches the Hakoah team was easily superior, playing the short-passing, highly-combined game of the British professional sides, and making the individualistic and rather disjointed efforts of the local teams seem ineffective by comparison. If further similar visits from foreign clubs could be arranged the standard of Egyptian football might be considerably raised.

BULGARIA.

Sofia, January 4.

The Sobranye.

Since its opening on December 9, the Sobranye has been in daily session, and recently morning as well as afternoon meetings have been held. The reply to the King's Speech, the Defence of the Realm Act, the Amnesty for the June and September rioters, and the law prohibiting the import of luxuries have consecutively come before the Chamber. The reply to the Throne is in process of elaboration, and may be delivered to-morrow.

The Defence of the Realm Act is at present being discussed, and the question of whether the death sentence shall be imposed has evoked a storm of protest from the Communist, Agrarian and Socialist parties. The Parliamentary Commission pronounced in favour, but the Government were inclined to reject their decision and substitute penal servitude for life. But the majority of the "Democratic Sgovor" Deputies were not content with this, and it looks as if the Commission's judgment will be upheld. The question is not in itself very important, but it has to some extent clarified a political situation which was very complex. It now appears fairly certain that the Democrats and Nationalists, supported by the Radicals, will constitute the governing force of the country. The Liberals dropped out three months ago, and the Socialists wish to go their own way. But while the Liberals are in open opposition, the Socialists will probably take up an attitude neither of opposition to nor of support of the Government. Their representative in the Cabinet, M. Kassassoff, has become to be regarded as a man possessed of common sense and far-sightedness. He can be trusted not to obstruct the Government needlessly.

In the law providing for an amnesty to those implicated in the June and September risings, the Government has refused to include the members of M. Radoslavoff's Cabinet, who were responsible for bringing Bulgaria into the War on the side of Germany.

Lastly, there is the law dealing with the import of luxuries. Towards the end of November, when the leva began to fall, the Government decided either to forbid the import of luxuries, or to levy a prohibitive tax thereon. Two weeks ago the law was put before the Sobranye, and the first two readings were voted. But so many and various articles, ranging, it is said, from soap to motor-cars, neither of which are manufactured in Bulgaria, were going to be excluded, that a veritable storm of protest was let loose. The French Chamber of Commerce was especially insistent in its demands, and eventually the Bill was withdrawn for further consideration. But it is not dead, and after the holidays will make its appearance in an altered form.

The Premier's Speech.

On December 28 M. Zankoff made a long speech in which he reviewed the internal and external situation of the country. The Prime Minister spoke with great sincerity, and was given an excellent hearing. In regard to foreign affairs he echoed the King's words, saying that Bulgaria desired to live on good terms with all the Great and Little Powers. He reaffirmed the intention of his Government to carry out loyally the Peace Treaty, but added that he hoped the Allies would not forget the question of the Bulgarian outlet to the Ægean and the Protection of Minorities.

M. Zankoff's speech has been very severely criticised by the Yugoslav Press, and the Yugoslav Minister in Sofia, M. Rakitch, has been recalled in order to confer with the Government concerning what is termed "the dangerous consequences which M. Zankoff's speech may give rise to." Undoubtedly Yugoslavia refers to the Macedonian question, but it is hard to see how anything M. Zankoff said should cause any umbrage. He touched on the Macedonian problem only in a general way, and in no wise criticised or attacked Yugoslavia. It is to be hoped that the matter may be quietly disposed of, and the fact that M. Rakitch has gone to Belgrade should help to dispel fears which would seem to be quite groundless.

Relations with the Soviet.

Very persistent rumours have been circulated regarding an offer on the part of the Soviet to resume diplomatic relations with Bulgaria. It was announced that the Soviet would guarantee that their representative would not meddle in Bulgarian domestic affairs, and that a similar guarantee would be obtained from the Third International. It has, however, been disclosed that these rumours are not based on truth. The Soviet have apparently made no offer to Bulgaria. Indeed, the vexed question of repatriation of Russian refugees is still in abeyance.

The Communists.

The Parliamentary Group of the Communist Party have re-christened themselves "Labour," and profess to have turned over a new leaf. They declare that in future they will struggle by legal means. But the saying that "a leopard cannot change his spots" would seem to describe aptly this action on the part of the Communists. Governmental circles are reserved as to the amount of sincerity underlying the move, and are not yet ready to believe that the Bulgarian Communists have renounced the gospels of Lenin and Trotsky in favour of those of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald.

High Cost of Living.

The year 1923 has shown no decrease in the high cost of living, and there are no certain indications that 1924 will either. Export is not flourishing, and although the "centralising" of all exchange in the hands of the National Bank has proved at least a temporary palliative against speculation, it will not be long before fresh complications will ensue in the banking world. The National Bank are reported as being in a condition to carry on indefinitely the business of buying and selling all foreign valuta, but several prominent private bankers aver that they will be able to do so only at great loss—a loss which, in the long run, will inevitably fall on the country. There is, indeed, a growing current of opinion that important and vast changes will have to take place in the policy of the executors of the nation's finance and economy. The business world is not satisfied. It declares itself living from day to day without knowing what new legislation the morrow may bring forth. The banks are also dissatisfied, but perhaps one may be permitted to say that the banks usually are. To-day, however, they would seem to have a real cause of complaint, as in Bulgaria, more than in most countries, they represent business as much as finance. In all these circumstances the outlook for the man in the street is not too comforting, and it only remains to hope that the Government may find a means of improving a situation which, if left to itself, may become dangerous.

Cold Weather.

Bulgaria has not escaped her share of the cold weather, and for the past week the temperature in Sofia has been about -30 degrees below zero during the day and as much as 50 at night. The train services have been greatly interrupted, and there has been a notable increase in illness. One remarkable result of the intense cold has been the appearance of wolves. At night they make

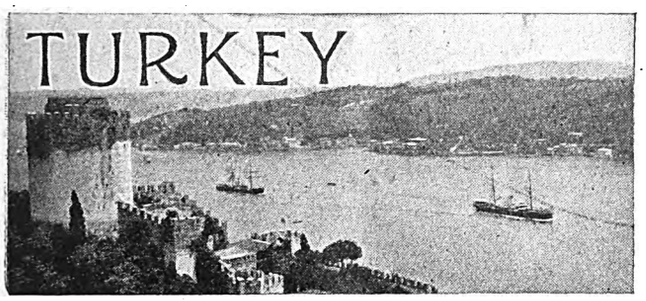
News in Brief.

Prince Cyril, the younger brother of King Boris, is spending the Christmas and New Year holidays at Sofia.

On New Year's Eve, King Boris, accompanied by Princess Eudoxia, was present at the Military Club, where the officers of Sofia Garrison held their annual ball.

Among the new diplomatic appointments announced this week is that of M. Naoumoff to be First Secretary at the Bulgarian Legation in London. M. Naoumoff had formerly been acting as Secretary to the King.



Constantinople, January 8.

The Acquittals.

The atmosphere is very much clearer than when I wrote last week, thanks to the verdict of acquittal delivered in the case of the three journalists. Everyone is breathing more freely, and the possibility of an outburst of political bad temper has been staved off by the somewhat belated display of good sense on the part of the Government. Although one may not wish to associate oneself with the pæans of praise for the spirit of justice and independence displayed by the President of the Court, of which the local Press is full, in view of the short time that has elapsed since his verdict in the Lutfi Fikri case was given, it is possible to see in the present verdict a sign that the nervousness and irritation of the Angora potentates have somewhat calmed down.

Angora and Constantinople.

There are times when one's sympathy goes out to the men at Angora, especially when in one's more tolerant moments one is prepared to concede the hypothesis that they have certain ideals and some of them, at any rate, are trying to live up to them. There is a small body of keen enthusiasts who are fired with the idea of creating a small lay republic, which shall divorce itself completely from the trammels and traditions of the Sultanate, Khalifate, and Byzantinism. They must be idealists; they cannot be diplomatists, otherwise it is utterly impossible to explain the fatal consistency with which they have run their heads against every brick wall that has presented itself for such treatment. They must be pure theorists, otherwise they would never have devoted themselves entirely to good works in the domain of abstract political theory, while materially the country is rapidly degenerating. That is the kernel of the quarrel, misunderstanding, divergence of views, or whatever you like to call it, that exists between Angora and Constantinople.

Angora is peopled by a small army of officials and deputies who are all salaried officials, and a fixed population of peasants and petite bourgeoisie, who are economically as independent of the rest of the world as the network of laundries on St. Helena. The economic distress and financial chaos are not vividly brought home to them in their daily life; in fact, the population is better off than it has ever been before, thanks to the influx of hundreds of strangers. Here the situation is exactly reversed, and it would be a marvellous phenomenon if the population of Constantinople, who are born grumblers, did not protest plaintively or vigorously against what, from their practical standpoint, they consider the crass idiocy of their rulers. There is only one course of action that may conceivably lead to a more balanced policy, and that is the transfer of the capital to Constantinople. What they have to fear here it is difficult to see, for they have abolished the Œcumenical Patriarchate in its Byzantine form, they have humbled the Khalifate in the dust, and they have so hedged foreign influence with restrictions that, if they still fear it, they deserve to groan under it.

Disorganisation of the Port.

The commencement of the New Year saw the application of the terms of the Lausanne Treaty which reserve the coastal shipping trade to the Turkish flag with the exception of nine foreign companies. In this matter, as in all others, the Angora authorities have rushed in where wise men would have been content for their own sakes to have trodden cautiously. In one fell swoop they practically abolished all the foreign tugs in the port, they banished the salvage institutions and completely disorganised the pilot service; and all this in the middle of winter, with a fierce North-Easter blowing. Of course, there was nothing even remotely adequate to take the place of what had been swept away. The result has been a number of more or less serious mishaps, exasperating confusion and delay, and a lot of plain truths, hurled at the heads of the port officials, in the free-and-easy language of plain-spoken mariners.

The Financial Situation.

Of all the great schemes for the resuscitation and reorganisation of the country, the two which are monopolising the attention of our legislators at present are help for agriculture and the improvement of the financial situation. With regard to the second, we seem to have got beyond the stage in which all was well in the best of all possible worlds. It has at last dawned upon the optimists that the mere use of a cheque-book is not evidence of wealth. The Minister of Finance has resigned, and a bold patriotic man has been found to succeed him. Now, instead of confident assertions that the Budget will certainly be balanced, we hear anxious expressions of pious hope that, notwithstanding the difficulties caused by the abundant credits that have been generously granted, the Budget Commission will succeed in approaching within sight of that desideratum. So much to the good. Further, we are assured that a régime of strict economy has set in. The judiciary has been reduced by the suppression of 27 courts of appeal and 137 courts of first instance. The General Direction of the Press has been abolished as an independent department, and reduced to a section of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. A previously granted credit of £T500,000 for the construction of a wireless station at Angora has been annulled and replaced by a credit of £E150,000 for the repair of the existing stations at Constantinople. Also, by a stricter control and a remodelling of the scales of bonuses, the Commission claims to have reduced the estimates for salaries by £T10,040,000. These measures, if they are put into practice, are admirable, and the Commission is to be congratulated upon them.

Agriculture.

The question of the assistance to agriculture appears to be in a less satisfactory stage. Months ago certain credits were allocated to the purchase of seed grain to be distributed to the farmers on easy terms. Hassan Bey, late Minister of Finance, interpellated on the state of affairs, stated that the first part of the credit, i.e., £T900,000, had already been expended, but that, owing to a difference between the Ministry and the Agricultural Bank, the second part of the operation had not yet been completed. Also it is apparent from his statements that there has been considerable delay owing to the unwillingness of the Government to buy the seed abroad and the impossibility of finding sufficient on offer in the country at a reasonable price. The general impression gained from reading his lame defence of his department is that very little of the seed required has found its way into the peasants' hands in time to be any use for the coming crop. If this is the case, the outlook is a very black one.

PERSIA.

Teheran, December 12.

Miscellaneous.

The Prime Minister is already turning his attention towards the improvement of education in the country, and recently called a meeting at his house of all representative notables in the capital to examine the question, and the best means of developing and spreading education among all classes. A Commission was elected to go into the matter, and has already started its labours.

The beggars who were recently gathered in from the streets and placed in charge of the Municipality are being well cared for by the latter, and a sum of about £3,000 has been set aside for their clothing and furniture, and a monthly sum of £1,500 appropriated for their food and upkeep.

THE ALBANIAN ELECTIONS.

The Results.

The returns of the elections for the Constituent Assembly are now available. Out of a total of 95 seats, 35 have been secured by the Liberal or Democratic Party. This party is the only really disciplined and homogeneous party in the State. It is led by the Orthodox Bishop Fan Noli, who is remembered in England for his able defence of Albanian claims before the League of Nations, and by Louis Gurakugi, the Catholic leader. Among its most prominent members are Agif Toptani Pasha, one of the ex-Regents; Suleyman Delvina, a former Prime Minister; Ali Klissura, Deputy for Argirocastro; and Spiro Koleka, ex-Minister of Public Works.

The present Prime Minister's personal following comes back with not more than twenty-six deputies. After the dissolution of the late Parliament, the Government majority split into two sections, those adhering to the Prime Minister, Ahmet Bey Zogu, and those adhering to the Minister of the Interior and of Public Works, Sefi Vlamasi. The latter group, known as the Popular Party, have been returned with 18 Deputies, among whom is the Foreign Minister, Pandeli Evangheli. This group, however, is not homogeneous, and in certain circumstances the present Prime Minister might count on the support of a certain number of its members, including Pandeli Evangheli and Eshref Frasheri, late President of the Chamber.

The remaining members (16) may be classed as independent. They fall into several groups. One of these is led by Shefouet Pasha Elbasani, prospective brother-in-law of the Prime Minister, who may accordingly count on the support of about ten of the independents. A second group is led by Elias Bey Vrioni, a former Prime Minister.

It appears, therefore, that no one party, or even a bloc of groups, prepared to support the present Prime Minister, possesses a majority. The Assembly meets on January 21, and the only certain thing that can be predicted is the fall of the present Administration.

The Premier's Achievement.

Ahmet Bey Zogu has shown himself a stout patriot and a strong ruler during a critical period of Albanian history. He has maintained order and has disarmed the majority of the population. But he has not succeeded in putting the country's finances in satisfactory order; he has not done very much to reform the Administration; and he has made many personal enemies. He has quarrelled with the army leaders, and the army in Albania is, unfortunately, not free from politics. The political influence of the able and energetic commandant of the gendarmerie, Shefquet Korcha, is considerable, and will be used against the Prime Minister's continuance in office, as well as against the formation of any Ministry composed of the big Beys. In fact, the army may be said to favour the Democratic Party.

Probable Formations.

But the Democratic Party equally lacks a majority. The most probable solution, therefore, is the formation of a rather colourless Ministry acceptable to moderate opinion in all parties. The most likely man to be called upon to form a Ministry is Elias Bey Vrioni, who, though himself a powerful Bey, is not opposed by the army. He is not a strong man, but is universally respected. He would probably include within his Ministry the present Minister of Justice, Titulani, and one or two members of the Democratic Party.

No great change is likely to be made in the Constitution. It is most improbable that a monarchy will be substituted for the present régime. The institution of four Regents, who perform the duties of a constitutional sovereign, will almost certainly be retained, and their powers will probably be strengthened by the right of a suspensive veto and of dissolving Parliament.

The Democratic Party desire to abolish the electoral colleges, through which deputies are now elected. They also wish to recall the exiles who were expelled from the country after the events of March, 1921, among whom are the ex-Regents, Monsignor Bumci and Dr. Tourtoli.

Aziz Pasha Izzet, the first Egyptian Minister to the Court of St. James, arrived at the Carlton Hotel, London, on January 11. The Minister was accompanied by his wife, the Princess Bahia, cousin of the King of Egypt, and by Mahmud Sabit Bey, First Secretary; Kemal Bey, Second Secretary; and Abdur Rahman Bey, Third Secretary.

A marriage has been arranged, and will take place on February 7, between Major Hubert Young, C.M.G., D.S.O., Indian Army, second son of Sir W. Mackworth Young, K.C.S.I., formerly Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, and Lady Young, of Lerryn, Weybridge, and Margaret Rose Mary, eldest daughter of Colonel F. R. Reynolds, R.E. (retired), and Mrs. Reynolds, of Bincleaves House, Weymouth.

OBITUARY.

The death has occurred of Colonel Sir Roper Parkington, who for many years was Consul-General for Montenegro in this country.

Mr. Robert Dacres Menzies Lang, P.W.D. India (retired), died in London on January 7. The second son of Captain E. W. Lang, R.N., he was trained at the R.I.E. College, and on appointment as assistant engineer in 1879 was posted to the N.W. Provinces and Oudh. He retired in 1903.

Major Nathaniel Clayton Cockburn died at his residence, Harmston Hall, Lincoln, on January 2, in his fifty-eighth year. He served during the Great War in the Lincolnshire Yeomanry in Egypt and Palestine. He was wounded in a submarine attack on the transport Mercian in the Mediterranean, when he was proceeding overseas with the Lincolnshire Yeomanry in 1916.

AN INVESTMENT POLICY FOR INDIA.

The busy season of Indian commerce has now set in, and during the next few months the bulk of the year's surplus produce will be converted into cash, to be expended in accordance with the needs, or the whims, of its individual owners. Prospects are favourable at the moment, for, while the surplus produce is large, markets are showing increased powers of absorption; but, on the other hand, there are as yet few signs that the returns will be wisely spent, and apparently Indians in the mass are as determined as ever to buy gold and silver in quantities far in excess of all reasonable needs. Our strictures on this old-established habit, almost the greatest economic vice of the country, have attracted some attention in India, and to-day we shall examine the two lines of criticism which have come to our notice. In the first place, it has been argued that Indians have a right to spend their money as they please, and that it is nobody's business but theirs. We agree that, thanks to British rule, they now have such a legal right, but we hold that the exercise of such rights must be subject to the claims of social duty. India is now possessed by lofty aspirations, which cannot be realised without a large progressive increase in the national income; it is the duty of all good Indians to set their wealth to work, and anyone who locks up his possessions in idle gold or silver is a traitor to the national ideals. The money is wanted urgently for productive purposes, whether looms and locomotives, or libraries and laboratories, and, in the existing circumstances, its mobilisation for such purposes is at once a worthy object and an imperative need. That is our answer to critics of the first class, and it requires no elaboration; but rather more detailed attention is called for by the arguments of the second class, who admit the duty, but urge that its performance is practically impossible. The owners of the surplus, it is contended, are numerous, scattered, and unorganised; individuals can do very little; the waters of Indian finance are turbid, and sharks abound: the ordinary man may be wanting in patriotism, but he is following a sound instinct when he remains on firm and familiar ground. We sympathise with this line of reasoning in so far that we recognise the need for organised and collective effort, for public leadership, and for the crystallisation of vague sentiment into practical policy.

As it presents itself to us, the problem concerns the interior of the country rather than the great commercial centres, where individual investors have more or less reasonable opportunities. A large proportion of the surplus income of the country comes into the hands of landholders, lawyers, and officials, classes which are roughly analogous to the proverbial "old maids and country parsons" whose savings financed England's rise to wealth, and are not less dependent on advice and leadership in the disposal of the sums, whether large or small, in their possession. In the case of the small investor, we fear that there is no alternative at the moment to Government securities, for the Indian banking movement has failed for the time being, but the progress already made by the existing State machinery justifies the hope that very much more can be accomplished. It is too soon yet to draw final conclusions regarding the result of the recent changes in the terms offered to investors through the Post Office, but the immediate effects have been most encouraging, and we believe that, if the existing machinery is wisely worked and developed, a time is in sight when the entire productive policy of the Governments, both central and provincial, can be financed by the small investor. Such, at least, is the aim which, in our opinion, the authorities should formally place before the public, to finance railways, canals, forests, and other public utilities entirely through the Post Office, and to leave the resources of the markets in London, Calcutta, and Bombay available for other forms of investment in ordinary times, and as a reserve for the Government in times of stress. To realise this aim will not be easy; but the earliest, and most difficult, steps have already been taken, and, if painstaking accountancy can be subordinated to financial statesmanship, we believe that the numbers of small investors will increase rapidly and progressively until the object is at last achieved.

While, however, the State should aim at becoming practically independent of the large investor, it cannot ignore his existence; but, in the interests of national progress, must take steps to ensure a proper market for his money. The absence of such a market is one of the notorious facts of the day. The two large stock exchanges have so far failed to win the confidence of the investing public. The evidence already given at the inquiry now in progress establishes this fact conclusively in the case of Bombay, while in regard to Calcutta, where open scandals have of late happily been avoided, it is generally believed by investors that the cream of the market is kept for local consumption, while the skimmed milk is thought good enough for the mofussil. It is unnecessary to ask how far these views are justified by facts; our point is that they exist, and that, so long as they continue to exist, the economic progress of the country will be retarded, because a large and regular flow of potential capital will remain unutilised. Here, then, we have the second branch of the constructive investment policy which is called for by the circumstances, to ensure that the men who have money, but not knowledge, shall have easy access to unbiassed information and to a free market for securities. On the present occasion we do not propose to examine in detail the various lines of action along which this policy can be pursued—reform of the existing exchanges, development of the functions of the Imperial Bank, which now dominates most of the country, formation of large investment trusts designed to average risks, or the other measures which have been suggested from time to time. Our object is to urge that the whole subject should be thoroughly explored. The task is by no means easy, but its performance is necessary, and the time is appropriate, because the Central Government is now unusually strong on the financial side. We may perhaps hope that the impending Budget will give less trouble and anxiety than were experienced last spring; the time and energy so released can be put to no better use than to devise measures for securing a progressive extension of the habit of investment, on the existence of which the future income of the country so largely depends.

A RESTORATION NAVAL CHAPLAIN IN THE MEDITERRANEAN.

By H. C. LUKE.

Extracts from the Diary of the Rev. Henry Teonge, Chaplain of H.M.S. Assistance, on active service in the Mediterranean. During December, 1675, H.M.S. Assistance was lying off Alexandretta (Scanderoond).

December 6.

The headsman that was sent for this Gaw's head, had command to bring 4 other Gaws' heads also, which order he executed; but going over the plaines of Antioch, he had accidentally lost on of them: he knowing not what course to take, (knowing also that his owne head must goe for that which he had carelessly lost,) did in his jurny lite of a poore Arabian, who had a lawdible black beard; the headsman maks no more a doe, but strangles the man, and takes of the skine of his head and face, and stuffs it with cotton (which is their way of beheadding, and they doe it so artifically that the very countenance and complexion of the man remaineth firme,) and brought it amonge the rest, and it passed currant. The heads-man himselfe tolde mee this sam story at Aleppo.

Here is an art (I meane from the 3 factorys) to send a pigion single, and somtimes 2 together, from hence to Aleppo upon any sudden occasion of shipping coming in, or any other buisnes. The pigions are bread at Aleppo, and brought downe on horseback in cages, and when occasion serves, a small note made fast to their wing, closse to theyr body with a sylke, yet so as not to hurt the wing; and then take them to the topp of the factory, and let him goe, and the pigion will fly home, (which any of our pigions would also doe,) and the pigion coming home, thinking to creepe in to his old habitation, is caught as it were in a cofer trapt, and taken, and examined.

Assistance having failed to find the corsairs, now prepared to rejoin the fleet, with two English merchantmen in convoy. Off Zante she falls in with Dartmouth and Dragon, convoying four merchantmen.

December 25.

Christmas Day wee keepe thus. At 4 in the morning our trumpeters all doe flatt their trumpetts, and begin at our Captain's cabin, and thence to all the officers' and gentlemen's cabins; playing a levite at each cabin doore, and bidding good morrow, wishing a merry Christmas. After they goe to their station, viz., on the poope, and sound 3 levitts in honour of the morning. At 10 wee goe to prayers and sermon; text, Zacc. ix., 9. Our Captaine had all his officers and gentlemen to dinner with him where we had excellent good fayre: a ribb of beife, plume-puddings, minct pyes, etc.; and plenty of good wines of severall sorts; dranke healths to the King, to our wives and friends; and ended the day with much civill myrth.

January 6, 1676.

Very ruff weather all the last night, and all this day. Wee are now past Zante: had wee beene there this day, wee had seene a greate solemnity; for this day being 12 Day, the Greeke Bishop of Zante doth (as they call it) baptise the sea, with a great deale of ceremony; sprinkling their gallys and fishing-tackle with holy-water. But wee had much myrth on board, for wee had a greate kake made, in which was put a beane for the king, a pease for the queen, a cloave for the knave, a forked stick for the coockold, a ragg for the slutt. The kake was cutt into severall peices in the great cabin, and all put into a napkin, out of which every on took his peice, as out of a lottery, then each peice is broken to see what was in it, which caused much laughter, to see our leiuetenant prove the coockold, and more to see us tumble on over the other in the cabin, be reason of the ruff weather.

January 15.

This morning wee warp out of the harbour, with 6 merchantmen and a doggar, which wee are to convoy towards the Straits mouth. Here also wee took in 2 months' provision, and fresh water. And as wee goe out, wee meete 6 gallys of Malta, coming in in all their pompe, and they salute us, and wee them, and part. And heare at Malta (which was very strainge to mee) at this time of the yeare wee bought radishes, cabbidges, and excellent colly flowers, and large ons for 1d. a peice.

January 30.

By 8 wee are at anchor in the harbour at Malta; where the Ginny and the Martin salute us with 5 gunns a peice; wee answer with 3 to each. Here wee are tolde of the joyfull news of Sir John's burning of 4 Trypoly men of warr in their owne harbour; and how wee tooke their guard boat first, and killed all that were in her, and so went in, and fyred the ships, and cam out again with out any man being hurt. No sermon to-day, our Captaine not being well. The plague is in the cytty, so that we have no prattick.

This day being the day of our King's marterdome, wee show all the signes of morning as possible wee can, viz., our jacks and flaggs only half staffe high; and at 5 a clock in the afternoone our ship fyred 20 gunns; the trumpetts at the close ringing the bells on the trumpetts very dolefully, and also the gunns fyreing at halfe a minute distance. Then the Dartmouth fyre 18 gunns at the same distance, and their trumpetts also the same; and our 2 merchants fyred 16 a peice. After all our trumpetts sounded Well-a-day, the Dartmouth did the same, and so were ended the day mornfully; which made the Maltees much woonder, till they understood the reason of it.

February 4.

This day dined with us Sir Roger Strickland, Captaine Temple, Captaine Harrice, and on gentleman more. Wee had a gallant baked pudding, an excellent legg of porke and colli-flowers, an excellent dish made of piggs' pettitoes, 2 rosted piggs, one turkey cock, a rosted hogg's head, 3 ducks, a dish of Cyprus burds and Pistachees and dates together, and store of good wines.

February 5.

God bless those that are at sea! The weather is very bad.

February 6.

Bad weather still. No sermon to-day; the Captaine not well.

February 7.

I dined on board the Gynny; and had harty welcom.

February 15.

The Grand Master cam to visit our Admirall, whoe gave him 11 gunns.

February 16.

I bought a wigg of Mr. Selby for 3 dollars, and som Syracosa wine; and a hatt cost 3 dollars.

February 22.

This day we saw a greate deale of solemnity at the launching of a new bryganteene of 23 oares, built on the shoare very neare the water. They hoysted 3 flaggs in her yesterday, and this day by 12 they had turned her head neare the water: when as a greate multitude of people gathered together, with severall of their knights and men of quality, and a clowd of fryars and churchmen. They were at least 2 howers in their benedictions, in the nature of hymns or anthems, and other their ceremonys; their trumpetts and other musick playing often. At last 2 friars and an attendant went in to her, and kneeling downe prayd halfe an howre, and layd their hands on every mast, and other places of the vessell, and sprinkled her all over with holy-water. Then they cam out and hoysted a pendent, to signify shee was a man of warr; and then at once thrust her into the water, where shee no sooner was, but they fyred 21 chambers, and rowed to our Admirall and gave him a gunn, whoe gave them another. Then she went into the cove where all their gallys lye, and was welcomed with abundance of gunns. And there are 4 more just ready to be launched, all for the coasts of Tripoly.

February 24.

The Portchmouth cam out last night. Wee stand for Trypoly, 14 brave shipps, and stand almost in a line.

February 25.

By 10 this morning, by a pendent on the mizon peake, our Admirall calls on the captaines to a consultation; for wee had before seene the eastern coasts of Trypoly.

With in an hower each of them was on board againe. But the wind rose this afternoon on a sudden, and hindered our designe.

March 4.

This morning wee are all close before Trypoly, and I suppose this will be joyfull Satterday to them; for boath the King and Queene of Tunis have beene at Trypoly since wee burnt their ships; and are to goe to the Greate Turke for ayd against those that have driven them from thence. They have desyred a convoy from our Admirall, and will make a peace betweene us and Trypoly. His name is Hopsiby, and tis related that he hath 700 concubines.

At on a clock cam a halfe-gally to our Admirall, and saluted him with all her gunns; our Admirall thanked him with 11, and then let fly all his pendents. At 5 a clock boath the bryganteene and the half-gally sent offe, and our Admirall gave them 11 gunns; and the halfe gally gave all shee had; but still our Admirall did out doe them in civility. The Bristow gave them 9, and the Portchmouth 9, as they went by them.

With in the harbour the King of Tunnis his ship saluted them with 8 gunns, and the shoare saluted them with 10, as I counted them; but the peace is not yet fully concluded.

No prayers to day by reason of buisnes. The peace, as it is sayd, is concluded; the King of Tunis being the only agent in it. The Trypolees are to give us 80,000 pieces of eight, and to release all the slaves that belonge to the crowne of England, and to release 4 merchants of Lygorne, and a knight of Malta; yet these must pay a certaine summ of monys; and this did bite sore, for betweene the Maltees and the Turks this is their absolute law, that whosoever of them is taken in actuall armes is never to be ransumed.

Tis the most honourable peace that ever yet was made with the Turks. They were very loath to pay any monys, but were so affrited at our bold attempt to burninge their ships, and also as much to see our fyre-shipps there, that they were forced to graunte what our Admirall would have.

March 8.

The articles are now all signed on boath syds, and the Trypolees sent off the articles, and at 5 in the morning fyred all the gunns about their cytty twice over, which was answered by all our fleete, and the peace is absolutely ratifyd.

At 8 a clock our ship takes leave of Sir John, and salutes him with 11 gunns and 3 cheares; and he nobly salutes us with as many; we return him thanks with 5, and so part; and our ship with the Dartmouth and 3 merchant ships stand for Scanderoond. This day I began to make buttons for som new cloaths.

March 29.

Wee discover the west end of Cyprus, but far off. Since yesterday 12 a clock to 6 this evening wee have runn 200 miles.

March 30.

The wind is so crosse that wee can not com to the anchoring place.

March 31.

At 8 wee com to an anchor in the bay of Saline; and are saluted by our merchants with 7, 5 — 5 gunns.

About 10 I went a shoare, the sea being very ruff. The fortt, standing neare the water, and faceing the roade, is very inconsiderable; haveing not above 9 pittifull gunns in it. Uppon the Mareene stands a small towne, consisting of coffee-houses, and shopps, and ware-houses, and other places where wine is to be sould. In the middle of the streete lay severall hundredds of hogg-skins full of wines, which at first sight I tooke for so many singed hoggs . . . . . west from this, about a little mile, stands Larneca; a pleasant walke leading to it; and is of itselte a pleasant village, beautifyd with severall handsom structures, such as that country affords; where wee had good entertainment, and excellent muskadell at our Consull's house. The feilds have little grasse therabout, but are overgrowne with camamile, marigolds, muscovy, etc. And great store of caper bushes, palm trees, almond trees, and olives; and such plenty of tyme, and so bigg growne, that the people stock it up to burne, as wee doe furse or ghosse.

Excellent wines, white and red, which they make in the mountaine, and bring it downe in hogg-skins, like little ferkins.

Sunday, April 9.

Wee are entred into the great bay that leads to Scanderoond. The buisnes of our ship hinders our devotions.

April 17.

A very blustering day. And this is (as it is called by our sea men) the last day of Lent; that is, the day wheron the last boyling of the beife that was bought at Cyprus, was flung over board; for the meate was so bad, that they chose rather to eate bread dry, then to eate that meate. That was much to our Purser's discreditt.

April 29.

This day about 10 of the clock, Captaine Harman of the Gynny and my selfe, and a Janizary, and his man, and my man, doe begin our jurny towards Aleppo. At a place calld Byland, about 10 miles from Scanderoond wee dine, at an olde Greek's house, with good mutton steaks; and drank good wine, and payd a dollar. . . . The Captaine and I have a tent pitched over us; and old Turkey carpet spread under, and a rowle of matting layd to lay our heads on. But what with the fleas and lyce that were in that carpett, and the froggs that were croakeing all about us, as also the hooteing of the jack-calls, I could not sleepe on winke, but we sat up and drank wine and brandee, of which wee brought good store with us; and there I did eat polloe with the Turkes.

Sunday, April 30.

Haveing rod a longe way in this plaine, (Sc. of Antioch) we com at the last to a small village, the worst that ever I saw; the houses being of nothing but reedes, and peices of the barke of trees covering the tops of them in the nature of hollow tyles. Tis inhabited by Arabeans, whoe have abundance of these buffeloes, and som few cowes, hoggs, som sheepe, and abundance of henns. Heare very neare to the houses are abundance of buffeloe calves, every on of them tyd (like so many beares) to a stake, where I suppose they give them milke. The people were many of them milking these cattell when the Captaine, and I, and our Janizary cam thither; for our Janizary had a friend lay there, which he was to call on, and he brought us out of the way to that place. And many foule women were makeing of butter of the buffeloes milke, which they put into calf's skin, or hogg's skin, and so doe rowle it, and kneade it on the ground till it be a substance, more like greace then butter boath for looks and taste; for the sheife lady of the towne (as I suppose by her habite) presented us with som of it, and a little of that would goe farr.

NEAR EAST BOOKSHELF.

BURTON'S EARLY DAYS.

"SELECTED PAPERS ON ANTHROPOLOGY, TRAVEL, AND EXPLORATION." By Sir Richard Burton. (London: A. M. Philpot. 15s.)

It is a very valuable work that Mr. Penzer has here performed in resuscitating certain early essays of Sir Richard Burton. To watch the formation and development of the mind of one of the greatest Eastern scholars and explorers, as one may do in this book, is a most fascinating experience. One can see, from an essay written in his late 'twenties, that extraordinary zest for languages and for out-of-the-way knowledge which eventually brought both fame and reputation; the desire to master the vernacular of any part of the world in which he might be placed, and to plunge farther into the mind, the habits, and the actual life of the people whom he was at the moment studying. Thus we see him as a young subaltern in the Indian Army—"with Persian at my fingers' ends, sufficient Arabic to read, write, and converse fluently, and a superficial knowledge of that dialect of Punjaubee which is spoken in the wilder parts of the province, I began the systematic study of the Scindian people, their manners and their tongue." A strange sort of soldier he must have been, wandering off on his own, and mixing with the natives as an Oriental, though not without his parallels to-day. He sufficiently penetrated their thoughts to be able thus to generalise upon the Eastern mind—"it ignores what is meant by 'golden mean'; it delights to range in flights limited only by the ne plus ultra of Nature herself."

But, though this book contains some extremely interesting essays upon such subjects as "Scalping," "Fans," "The Dahoman," and (specially readable) on Battista Belzoni, the great Italian explorer whose grave at Gwato Burton tried to find, it is naturally to the chapters upon "The Guide-Book to Mecca" and "A Trip to Harar" that readers of THE NEAR EAST will soonest and most often turn. The Guide-Book is an extremely vivid piece of writing, in the vein of detached intimacy which Burton later brought to so high a pitch of perfection. The following passage, for instance, serves admirably to illustrate both his power of penetration and of description :—

There is little doubt that this pilgrimage, like all others, began with a mixture of commerce and religion : the latter element now predominates. In former years, when travelling was more difficult, the hadgee (Haji), or pilgrim, wore, after his return home, a green turban. The custom is now obsolete in more civilised lands. Maids, wives, and widows go through the ceremonial enactments, and "O pilgrimess!" is the civil address to women of the lower orders in Egypt and other Moslem lands.

Jeddah, the port of Mecca, and the capital of the Tehama province, lying on the eastern shore of the Red Sea, is the favourite landing-place of pilgrims. It is a truly tropical picture. Above, a pitiless sun rains yellow fire through air as blue as the turquoise. Below is an ultramarine sea, streaked emerald green, showing where shoal water overlies golden sand, and dotted with coral rocks that form the dreaded "Gateway of Jeddah." Between the two lies the thin line of red-yellow ground, utterly sterile, with here and there sandy downs and rocky, pointed hills—an iron land. The town is a long streak of dull-brown ruins and white houses glaring as twelfth-cakes. The material is coralline-limestone, and the habitations are oblong, like the old brick houses of England, but decorated with the picturesque alcoves and the huge hanging balconies of carved wood which the overland traveller sees for the first time at Malta. . . .

The "Trip to Harar" is first-class matter. Burton started in 1854 from Zayla, on the African coast of the Red Sea, and thence in disguise through the territory of the Eesa and the Gallas he journeyed the 200 miles to Harar. The capital of the Hadijah Empire he found interesting, and in some ways novel. On his return route to Berbera he met with uncommon experiences, which read almost like adventure.

It is good to have these obscure essays of Burton collected into one book, and Mr. Penzer deserves the thanks of all lovers and admirers of Burton. For so collating the rarer efforts of Burton's pen, much more than for his occasional introductory and explanatory notes—which are often superfluous and can have little but transient value—we tender our gratitude.

ORIENTAL STUDIES.

"BULLETIN OF THE SCHOOL OF ORIENTAL STUDIES." Vol. III Part I November, 1923. (6s.)

The latest number of this Bulletin will maintain fully the reputation already secured for serious scholarship. It makes no appeal to the general reader, but students of the languages and history of Asia and Africa will find it indispensable. Some of the reviews strike us as particularly valuable; the criticism is courteous but thorough, and there is a refreshing absence of the tendency, still noticeable in some other publications, to treat Indian writers merely as precocious children. We trust the editor will maintain the practice of valuing books, whatever their origin, strictly on their merits as contributions to knowledge.

PRESS ON THE NEAR EAST.

Macedonia.

In the Labour Magazine of December Mr. T. P. Conwill-Evans writes upon "The Bulgarian Revolution and After." Upon the burning question of Macedonian influence on the Balkan situation he writes :—

> The colonists (Macedonians) are organised in two groups; the first is constitutional and hopes to influence not only its own Government, but those of the West, to press Serbia to fulfil her Treaty obligations; the second is illegal in Bulgaria, and is violent in method, and will apparently recoil from no deed, however brutal, in order to promote its aims. There is no doubt that while Stambulisky fell a victim of an anti-Bolshevik movement Macedonians actually participated in his murder, as he appeared to them to have completely thrown over their cause for the sake of peace with Serbia. For the moment the colonists are the allies of the present régime. Whether they will continue to give their support depends on the policy of M. Zankoff, the new Premier. On being questioned on the point M. Zankoff stated that his Government aimed wholeheartedly at the fulfilment of minority rights in Macedonia as conferred by the Peace Treaties.
> The peace of the Balkans depends on the removal of this grievance. If incidents occur the Bulgarian Government should not be blamed. How can the Sofia Government, with the ridiculously small forces at its disposal, control the movements of these outraged Irishmen of the Balkans? If Yugo-Slavia realises that the main responsibility rests with her one may begin to hope. Belgrade should take a lesson from the British Government's attitude to Irishmen, and, instead of making the path as hard as possible for their alien subjects, satisfy their just claims as settled by Treaty. Yugo-Slavia has obtained all, and perhaps more, than all her rights through the Peace Treaties. In return, one expects from her the execution of a civilised and humane policy towards her alien subjects.

A correspondent of the Times sent to the issue of January 4 a sketch of Alexandroff of Macedonia, in which he gives the following interesting details concerning the prospects of the revolutionary organisation :—

> Concerning the strength of his forces, Alexandroff claims that in Macedonia alone he can mobilise approximately 150,000 men. He pointed out, however, that the great proportion of these men were at present civilians, and that only a few thousand Komitadjis (bands of armed men) were now on a war footing. He did not refer to Macedonians outside the frontier, but it is thought that in the event of a rising many thousands now in Bulgaria would flock to his colours. When questioned as to the possible date of a revolution, he replied that circumstances were not yet altogether favourable. I took this to mean that the organisation had not yet made all their preparations. Besides this I gathered that bigger reserves of arms and munitions were going to be accumulated. Alexandroff went on to say that he hoped that the Croats, Slovenes, and Montenegrins would in the long run discard legal for illegal methods against Serbia; a combined rising might then take place.

Asked if a compromise was not possible between the Organisation and the ruling authorities, he replied that many Serbians now resident in Macedonia realised that the present situation was extremely unsatisfactory, but that the party of Pashitch, the principal statesman in Serbia, seemed inflexible in their desire to destroy Macedonia. But, he explained, "Turkey tried to destroy us during countless years; she failed, and it is important to remember that then the considerable Turkish population was against the Revolutionary Organisation. Now the Turks are with us, and I emphatically state that we are stronger than we have ever been before." Alexandroff admitted to being in relations with Turkey, but it is easy to see that he does not place much faith on outside assistance. His is a Macedonian movement, which he hopes to bring off in conjunction with other races now forming part of the Triune Kingdom. At the same time he professed the willingness of the Organisation to submit to any impartial inquiry about the situation in Macedonia by the Great Powers, the League of Nations, or a group of independent journalists. In addition, he stated that, failing the granting of autonomy, the Organisation would welcome the placing of Macedonia under the protection of a Great Power, preferably England.

The Trials of Turkey.

The Times of January 4 says that the acquittal of the three Turkish editors has evidently relieved large classes of the Turkish population from a great fear. Further, it is "a heavy blow to the Angora Government, to their majority in the Assembly, and, in particular, to Ismet Pasha, the author of the prosecutions." It proceeds to comment upon the attitude and the strength of different parties in Turkey. Quite apart from the question of the Khalifate, it says, the dominant party at Angora is now uneasy:—

> A number of educated Turks, many of whom belonged, and may possibly still belong, to the Committee of Union and Progress, have long been displeased with certain features in the new régime, and the withdrawal of the Allied troops from Constantinople has freed them from the restraints which patriotism imposed during the occupation. Then the proposals for the permanent removal of the capital to the remote and comfortless provincial town of Angora naturally occasion dissatisfaction in Constantinople. General and widespread misery exist among the population, and murmurs are loud that the Government have done little or nothing to alleviate them. . . . The outcome of the State prosecution may be to lead Ismet and his colleagues to the adoption of still more drastic measures, or it may convince them that modifications of the present masterful system are expedient. The one thing clear is that the trials have greatly weakened their position for the present. They may recover it, but they cannot afford more mistakes.

The Scotsman of December 29 says that there are in Turkey at the present time three parties:—

> The Republican Party, which holds itself by force; a Sultan Party, and a religious party. Evidently the last must finally take sides with one or another of the other two if it is to have any real influence. Meanwhile, the Republic stands, and Kemal is the Republic. Whereby is not implied that he has no enemies: of them he has cleared away some, and now regrets the method employed; others do not risk their lives in Anatolia, nor does Kemal risk his life by a visit to Constantinople. . . . Events that followed the recent election of Archbishop Gregory to the Greek Patriarchal throne are significant. There can be little doubt that when Papa Eftimios appeared in the Patriarchate, expelled five Archbishops, and ordered Gregory to resign the day after the election, he had Angora behind him, but the force of opinion was too strong, and protests to Government were too emphatic. . . . But Kemal is in political power, holds the Grand Assembly in his pocket, is President of his party, of the State itself, and functions as President in other relationships; the Sultanate is declared separated from the Caliphate; many are of opinion that his aim is to have himself proclaimed as Sultan. . . .

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London, W.C.,
Tuesday Morning.

British Industries Fair.

About this time it is usually possible to sum up the prospects with regard to the coming Fair. On account of the British Empire Exhibition, this year's event, as my readers are aware, is being held considerably later than usual, and it is very satisfactory to be able to state that the London section of the Fair has apparently not suffered in support owing to the counter-attraction of the Exhibition. The position with regard to the Birmingham section of the Fair is not so favourable. I understand, indeed, that the demand for space up to the present is very much below last year's figures at the same period. Of course, there is ample time for the shortage to be made good, and it is to be hoped that Birmingham firms will realise the desirability of giving the fullest support to the Fair as well as to the Exhibition.

Westminster Bank.

Very satisfactory results are again reported by the Westminster Bank, the net earnings at £1,804,800 being not very much below the level of the previous year. The allocations are £100,000 to the premises account against £200,000, £100,000 to the contingent fund against £300,000, and £300,000 to the rebuilding account against £150,000. It is proposed to maintain the dividend at 20 per cent. for the year on the £20 shares and 12½ per cent. on the £1 shares, and to carry forward £568,480 as compared with £536,585.

Egypt's Finances.

The figures of Egypt's finances for 1922-3 make a very favourable showing. The receipts amount to £E35,763,000, while the expenditure totals £E28,247,000, the surplus thus being £E7,516,000, or nearly four times the estimate. There has been a substantial increase in revenue, due mainly to increased receipts from the Customs, the railways, and the cotton tax, while the expenditure was considerably below the estimate. The result, of course, reflects the gradual improvement that has taken place in the economic position of Egypt, and in view of the great change in the cotton situation, the outlook is certainly very promising for the country.

Germany and the Middle East.

Internal conditions in Germany do not seem to present an insuperable obstacle to the resumption of that country's attempts at expansion, and in particular in the direction of the East, which always seems to have had an irresistible fascination in German eyes. Following the great shipping exploit via the waterways of Germany and the Danube from Hamburg to the Caspian—a grand gesture the results of which seem as uncertain as the route is tedious—it is now reported that the German Government is to subsidise a steamship company which will have regular sailings to the Persian Gulf. No doubt those who are concerned with the question of Reparation payments will take due note of what Germany finds it possible to do in her impoverished state with a view to future commercial penetration.

Indian Railway Results.

The half-yearly reports of Indian railways are now making their appearance, and a feature of them is that while they show a decline in earnings this is more than offset by the lower working expenses. In the case of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway there was a fall of 7½ per cent. in the gross receipts, but owing to the substantial saving in operating expenses, the net revenue shows an increase of over 50 per cent. The net revenue, excluding State lines, amounted to Rs. 1,43,10,053, and the total interest charges absorbed Rs. 1,81,05,507, leaving the deficit at Rs. 37,95,500. The East Indian Railway report also shows smaller gross earnings and a larger decrease in working expenses, the net revenue being Rs. 16,61,800 higher at Rs. 3,25,39,200. After provision for all charges, the divisible surplus is Rs. 1,05,38,300, of which the company's portion amounts in sterling to £27,200, as against £29,400, and it is proposed to make the total dividend on the deferred annuity and the deferred annuity class "D" capital ½ per cent., in addition to the guaranteed interest of 2 per cent.

The Story of Cox's.

The announcement that a history of Cox and Co., the Army bankers, is in preparation has naturally aroused very general interest. The bank has been so prominent in connection with the Army that it would have been regrettable if some step had not been taken to place on record its part in affairs. A history usually conjures up the idea of a dry collection of facts, but I think it highly improbable that the life story of "Mr. Cox" will be dry. Certainly it need not be, judging by the numerous stories of the ben trovato order that have found currency regarding his intimate relations with young subalterns and others during the late war.

Stock and Share Markets.

PRICES LOWER GENERALLY.

Gilt-Edged Depressed.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday Morning.

There has not been any pronounced activity on the Stock Exchange in recent weeks, if I except the pronounced fall in values after the General Election result was known, and there has not, therefore, been much to write about. Now that the holidays are well behind us, and Parliament (with its unpleasant possibilities) is again in session, movements of the markets promise to be of much greater interest.

Adverse Factors.

The markets at the present time are in a very uncertain state. It is not merely the political situation which is responsible for this, though this factor, which, in my opinion, is as yet far from being discounted as some hold, has had no slight incidence. There is also the threatening industrial situation, which, at the moment, seems likely to yield us one or perhaps two strikes this year. I suppose we must be thankful for the brief rest we have had from these industrial disputes, but it is a pity that the periodicity of the strike seasons (it really would seem that they recur at regular intervals) is not less frequent. Finally, and not least among the factors that have depressed the markets, must be reckoned the extremely unfavourable exchange position. It will have been noted that the decline in the New York rate for sterling set in with the adverse developments in the political situation here. Now we have the French exchange weakening to an alarming extent, a tendency that was inevitable as a result of the failure to obtain Reparations from Germany. The effect of all these factors has been to depress the markets acutely, and yesterday a weak tone was in evidence all along the line. In the prevailing circumstances it is difficult to take a very optimistic view of the outlook in the immediate future. Certainly there can be no question of buoyant markets until the political situation here is stabilised, and that, unfortunately, is an event which may take some time to bring about. Meanwhile, we must reconcile ourselves to the prospects of fluctuations.

Gilt-Edged Weak.

Gilt-edged securities have naturally been particularly affected by the prevailing conditions, and some sharp declines have taken place. Consols shed $\frac{3}{8}$ yesterday, and are now $54\frac{5}{8}$, the Conversion Loan lost $\frac{1}{2}$, and is $74\frac{3}{8}$, War Loan Fives are $\frac{3}{8}$ down at $98\frac{5}{8}$, while Fundings have fallen a point to $84\frac{1}{4}$. Indian stocks have also weakened, the chief fall being in the Three per Cents., which, at $53\frac{3}{4}$, are a point down. The $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cents. are $\frac{1}{4}$ down at $99\frac{1}{2}$, while the 7 per cent. Loan is unchanged at $112\frac{1}{2}$. The Sudan $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Loan has been steady at 94.

French Stocks Lower.

Under the influence of the exchanges and the political situation, the market in foreign Government securities has been uncertain, but it is noteworthy that prices as a whole held up much better than in the gilt-edged market, and in a few cases actually advanced. French stocks fell away on the depreciation in the exchange, War Loan Fives being a point down at 22, while the Four per Cents. are a similar amount down at 18. German Three per Cents. have been steady at 21s., while Italian Rentes have gained $\frac{1}{2}$ at $19\frac{1}{2}$. In Near Eastern securities Turkish Unified have been a weak spot, and at 17 are $\frac{3}{4}$ lower. Greek stocks have generally been good, with Monopolies at $42\frac{1}{2}$.

Industrials Dull.

The Industrial group has made a very unpromising showing, railways in particular being very weak. There is a certain amount of selling in progress, and in present conditions this naturally has an effect out of proportion to its volume. Even here there have been some firm spots.

Textiles have been weak, with Courtaulds 9d. down at 58s. 6d., while Coats are 60s. 3d. Engineering and Iron and Steel shares have been dull. Armstrongs are 3d. down at 15s. 6d., Guest Keens are 6d. lower at 38s., while Vickers are 3d. down at 13s. 3d. Shipping securities have been fairly firm. P. and O. Deferred are steady at 28s, Cunards are slightly better at 18s. 9d., while Furness Withys are firm at 27s. 6d.

Tobacco shares have been dull, Bats being 97s. 3d. xd., while Imperial Tobaccos are 67s. Movements in Bank shares have not been pronounced. Chartered of India are 1-16 down at 19 3-16, Imperial of Persia are unchanged at $7\frac{1}{4}$, P. and O. Banks are 12. National of Egypt are $24\frac{3}{4}$, while Westminster Banks are $\frac{1}{8}$ lower at $16\frac{5}{8}$.

Oils Variable.

Oils have been quite firm compared to some of the other markets, though here, too, some shares are fractionally lower. Considering how this market is usually influenced by the exchanges and adverse political developments, the relatively quiet tone is not a little surprising.

The strength of Burmahs has been a feature of the group, and at 4 13-16 this security shows a considerable advance on the week. Anglo-Persians are also harder at 2 7-16. In the Egyptian group Anglo-Egyptian B are $1\frac{1}{8}$, while Gemsah Oil Reefs are 7-16. Among Roumanians, Dacia Romanas are 12s., Phœnix are 17s. 9d., Steaua Romanas are 8s. 6d., while Hamilton's Concessions are 1s. 3d. Lobitos are $6\frac{5}{8}$, Shells are 4 1-16, while Mexican Eagles are 17s. 6d.

Egyptians Steady.

There have been few changes in Egyptian securities. Aboukirs are 21s., Beheras are 11, Egyptian Markets are 23s., Gharbieh Lands are 2, New Egyptian are 25s., Sidi Salems are $1\frac{5}{8}$, while Union Foncières are $2\frac{3}{4}$.

In Sudan descriptions, Sudan Plantations are 6 7-32, while Kassala Cotton are 16s.

Rubbers Easy.

A quiet tone has continued to rule in the Rubber market, as is only to be expected in the existing circumstances. London stocks are still decreasing, and all the indications point to the development of demand at no distant date, but the price of the raw commodity remains at a low level, and, in consequence, the share market stagnates. It is a very disheartening experience for shareholders, but there is nothing to do but hold on with the certainty that in the end there will be a recovery.

TURKEY AND SHIPPING.

Angora or Constantinople?

In no direction has the inexperience of the present administration of Turkey been more strongly marked than in regard to the attitude of the Angora authorities to shipping and navigation. No one expects untrained administrators to do other than make mistakes at first, and it was realised that the Turks, in their enthusiasm "to change this sorry scheme of things entire," would do much that the passage of time would cause them to regret, and it is only too evident that this expectation is being fulfilled. By the Treaty of Lausanne foreign participation in the coastal trade of Turkey was restricted to a limited number of companies, and this provision came into force at the beginning of this year. Prudence would have dictated extreme caution in the introduction of a new régime, but festina lente is a maxim with which Angora has yet to make acquaintance, and the Turkish authorities have hastened to make every possible alteration under the Treaty, and so, as our Constantinople Correspondent points out, they have "practically abolished all the foreign tugs in the port," and have, in addition, "banished the salvage institutions and completely disorganised the pilot service." The result of these hasty measures has, of course, been serious. Whatever may be the case in the future, it is quite certain that Turkey is at present incapable of replacing the services she is so ready to dispense with, and the inevitable effect will be that Turkish trade will suffer. Hitherto underwriters have quoted reasonable rates for ships in Turkish waters. Is it likely that they will long continue to do so? The region is not the easiest for navigators; it contains, as a matter of fact, exceptionally difficult stretches, and it would seem inevitable that with the considerable volume of traffic from the Black Sea and elsewhere it will not be long before there are one or two serious mishaps, and then it may well be that rates will be quoted that will induce shipowners to utilise their craft in other and safer directions. How far such considerations will weigh with Angora time alone can prove.

It may well be asked how it is that the authorities at the little Anatolian capital are so blind to the real interests of the country that they are capable of such actions. The reason is that, as our Correspondent suggests, Angora is entirely divorced from Constantinople; one might add from the rest of the country and from reality as well. Angora is a self-contained unit, more prosperous than ever before, as the result of the influx of Deputies and Government employees, and those who are there, perhaps not unnaturally, in the circumstances, take the view that if all is well at Angora, Turkey must be all right. It is not difficult, indeed, to understand that the Angorans are totally incapable of appreciating the position at Constantinople. The need for foreign salvage services and foreign pilots must seem very remote at Angora, and it can well be imagined that the mere knowledge of their existence has simply served to fan the ardour of an unreasoning and irrational nationalism. Other instances, not less absurd, of the extreme lengths to which the love of "independence" has led the Turks could be given. The whole policy of Angora since Lausanne, indeed, has been framed on unreal lines. The hope for the future lies in a return to reality, and that implies the abandonment of the hope of imposing on the little centre of Anatolia a rôle for which it was never fitted, and for which no amount of adaptation can render it suitable. In short, it means that the rulers of Turkey must return to Constantinople, where alone they can be in a position accurately to gauge the needs of the new Turkey. If they had been at the Sublime Porte this trouble could never have arisen, and if they had been students of history there would never have been any question of a capital at Angora, for they would have been aware that capitals, and, indeed, any large centres, have not come into existence at random, but because the site offers special and sometimes (as, for instance, in the case of Constantinople) unique advantages. The change is, it would seem, inevitable, and the sooner it is made the better it will be for the New Turkey.

MOTORS IN ALGERIA.

The number of automobiles registered in Algeria (says the Acting British Consul-General at Algiers in his annual report on Algeria) is:—Lorries, 2,055; motor omnibuses, 344; touring cars, etc., 12,373; motor-cycles, 559; total, 15,331. This does not, however, indicate the actual number of cars in the country, as it includes cars registered but which have since been exported. The total number taxed is 9,268, of which 4,297 are in the Department of Algiers. No less than 5,067 of these cars are under 13 h.p., and 3,179 under 25 h.p. Customs statistics show 2,238 new cars imported in 1922, against 1,478 in 1921. This number again does not represent the correct figures owing to complexities in nomenclature.

SPECIAL. MARKET REPORT.

NABLUS, December 8.

The market for oils is very active, and, as the crop in the region is not sufficient to supply the soap factories, the manufacturers are hastening to purchase the necessary supplies, especially as the prices here are better than those abroad.

JAFFA, December 15.

Rain fell towards the end of the week. No oranges were exported during the week.

HAIFA, December 15.

An important business has been done in grain. The tendency for prices to rise has continued to the end of the week, and appears likely to persist.

The following extracts are taken from the monthly circular of the Imperial Ottoman Bank:—

JAFFA. Commercial Situation, October. There is no outstanding change to report for the month under review, and trading conditions continue dull, with the exception of business in connection with the export of the orange crop. On the whole prices have fallen slightly during October.

The total quantity of goods imported into Jaffa during September amounted to 8,234 tons, valued at £E172,341, being an increase in weight of 395 tons and £E18,128 in value as compared with the figures of the previous month. The total customs revenue for the month amounted to £E28,750, being a decrease with the corresponding period of 1922. The total exports for the month amounted to 1,161 tons, valued at £E28,750, being a decrease of 12 tons in weight and an increase of £E3,461 in value as compared with the previous month.

HAIFA, September.—The total value of goods imported into Haifa, including transit, amounted to £E104,254, as compared with £E134,238 for the corresponding month of last year. The total value of the exports amounted to £E38,865, as compared with £E57,270 during the same period of last year.

GRINDLAY AND CO.

Grindlay and Co., Ltd., has been registered as a private company, with a nominal capital of £250,000 in £5 shares to take over the businesses carried on as Grindlay and Co., at 54, Parliament Street, Westminster, and at Calcutta, Bombay, Delhi, Simla, and elsewhere, whether as bankers, agents, or otherwise. The company is to adopt an agreement dated November 2, 1923, with J. H. Matthews, A. Low, C.I.E., T. J. Matthews, and Lieut.-Col. S. Low, D.S.O. The first directors are Messrs. R. Malcolm, T. J. Matthews, A. Low, and S. Low.

NEW CUNARD-BROCKLEBANK SERVICE.

The Cunard, Brocklebank, and allied companies are establishing a new direct steamship service from Calcutta and Colombo to Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. The first ship to sail on the route will be the Malakuta from Calcutta on March 3. The Brocklebank Line is to supply the ships for the new service, which is to be known as the Brocklebank-Cunard service.

TANKER CHARTERING REVIEW.

Demand Consistently Increasing.

Messrs. John I. Jacobs and Co., of London, in their half-yearly report on tanker chartering, state:—

Whilst tank steamer rates of freight remained at a lower level during the second half of 1923, the low level attained during the early months of the year was never reached. California still remains the dominating factor in the tanker freight market, as the bulk of American tonnage continues to be kept employed in the long inter-coastal voyage between California and the Atlantic Coast refineries. Inquiry during the six months under review has been consistently increasing owing to the general expansion of demand for all classes of petroleum products. Rates towards the end of the year showed a firmer tendency, and as the oil trade generally expects higher prices and a considerably increased demand, freights should normally go to rather higher levels. The peak of production was reached in the Californian fields in September, since when there has been a marked decrease; but, on the other hand, additional production has been attained in the Mid-Continent fields of the U.S.A. Nevertheless, it is anticipated that oil consumption will be such by the middle of next year that stocks will be reduced to more normal levels.

The increasing popularity of the Diesel engine, both for liners and for tank steamers, has to be noted. Owners of tramp tonnage are still awaiting proof as to the life of this description of engine for propelling purposes. Furthermore, tramp steamer owners do not feel justified in incurring the extra initial cost required with the freight market at its present low level. Steam-engined tankers of about 9-10,000 tons d.w. can be built at £12 per ton d.w. and "Diesel" tankers at £15-16 per ton d.w. The fuel oil bunkering trade continues to expand very largely owing to the increasing popularity of oil fuel with owners generally. 48.4 per cent. of the total tonnage classified by Lloyd's Registry during 1923 was fitted for burning oil fuel. In round figures tanker tonnage afloat has increased from 1,479,000 to 5,204,000 tons during the period July, 1914, to July, 1923; and Lloyd's returns for September showed a total gross tonnage of tank steamers building of 178,590 tons, of which 92,796 tons was building in the U.K. and Ireland, against a total of 300,128 tons at the end of 1922 building throughout the world.

Prospecting for oil continues very active throughout the world, but no absolutely new fields of note have been brought in. In Mexico the production of the lighter grades of crude oil has continued to decline, but, except for the month of July, production in the Panuco fields has been maintained; it is anticipated by many that this country will in the near future come into its own again. Russia has increased her production and exports. The position in Roumania can be considered as favourable, whilst the new laws giving greater freedom in regard to export should stimulate activity in that country.

The larger tanker of 8-10,000 tons d.w. still appears to be the type most easily operated. Tankers laid up during the second half of 1923 have been very few, in most cases for special reasons. Tankers have, during the last six months, been operated on the barest margin of profits, if any; and owners generally are expecting improved conditions in 1924, with, we think, some justification. During the period under review representative rates of freight have been as under:—

Time Charter.—There has been a moderate demand, and rates for steam-driven tankers have varied from 5s. 6d. to 6s 3d. on d.w. for periods of from six to twelve months. Time charterers with experience of such vessels have chartered "Diesel" tonnage at 8s. on d.w. It is worthy of note that Californian charterers have arranged to take two Diesel vessels of about 10,000 tons d.w. each, now building, at about 7s 3d. for ten years.

Northern States of America.—As usual, the tonnage demand for trans-Atlantic voyages has been on a considerably smaller scale than from the Gulf of Mexico. Demand has been mainly for the handier sized boats for spirit and for lubricating oil. The highest rate obtained for U.K. Cont. was 32s. in July, after which 25s. was paid in August and 20s. 6d. in December. Tankers of 6,000 tons cargo capacity and over can usually be had at 3s. to 4s. below Gulf of Mexico rates. A handy boat was fixed for Marseilles at 30s. and another at 20s. 6d. Rates for Spain were on the basis of 21s. for Northern ports and 23s. 6d. for Southern and Mediterranean ports.

Gulf of Mexico.—The inquiry has mainly been for boats of 7/8,000 tons for refined and/or spirit, and for the larger sizes for black oils. Rates for clean tonnage in July were on the basis of 30s. and for dirty tonnage 27s. 6d. to U.K. Cont. There was a gradual decline during the second half of the year to 23s. 6d., but the period under review finishes with a rather firmer tone. Small boats for lubricating oil got higher rates, but not in proportion to the extra cost of running tonnage of small size. Representative rates for Baltic ports were 35s. Helsingfors, 30s. Stockholm, 27s. 6d. Gothenburg, and 26s. Copenhagen. Marseilles took clean tonnage at rates varying from 28s. to 25s. 6d., and West Italy at 29s. spirit and 23s. 6d. fuel oil. Several fixtures were reported to Alexandria at 30s. Rio de Janeiro paid 26s.

Mexico to United States Refineries.—A very considerable amount of chartering has been done, practically in every case for boats of over 8,000 tons capacity. Rates declined from 37 cents in July to 25 cents per barrel in September from Tampico to the Northern Range. In October a firmer tendency was noted, and at the close of the year 28/30 cents could be readily obtained. The refinery at Fall River took a considerable amount of tonnage at from one to two cents over the New York rate. The rate of New Orleans and the adjacent refineries varied from 22 cents in July to 15 cents in October, at which figure the rate remained steady.

California.—Owing to the amount of tonnage taken up earlier in the year, both on time charter and consecutive voyages, the volume of business to the refineries on the eastern coast of the United States was on a much smaller scale and at reduced rates, commencing at 90 cents per barrel California to Northern Range; rates steadily declined to 80 cents in September and 67½ cents in December, with less inquiry.

The amount of tonnage taken on the market for U.K. or Continent was also within narrow limits, and rates varied from 40s. to 33s. 9d., but closed steadier at 37s. 6d. to 40s.

Russia.—The amount of business done from the Russian Black Sea oil ports has been on a somewhat greater scale owing to increased production and improving facilities. At the turn of the half-year rates were on the basis of 30s., but rapidly declined to 22s., with a further fall later to 20s. to U.K. Continent, principally Thameshaven or Hamburg. Riga paid 32s. 6d. on one occasion.

Creosote.—About the average amount of tonnage has been chartered, despite conditions in the Ruhr. The representative rate has been 13s. 6d. for 7,500 tons from one port of loading to one port of discharge. A part cargo of 4,000 tons paid 17s. 6d., and the latest rate recorded is 11s. for 8,000 tons.

FORTHCOMING SAILINGS.

EGYPTIAN MARKETS.

Futures Practically Unchanged.

The Alexandria Commercial Company, in its report for the week ended January 4, states:—

Since our last report the futures market, owing to New Year holidays, has been open only for four days; prices have fluctuated but little. There is very little fresh to report. New York has been slightly easier, and the demand from abroad moderate. Lancashire and the Continent continue to be steady buyers, whereas America keeps more or less out of the market. Our exports have appreciably increased compared to last year for the former textile centres, and have decreased by more than half for the latter. Speculators have not been active of late; they prefer to adopt a cautious policy for the time being, the uncertain political situation in England being the main cause. The movement in the interior shows signs of abatement, and the figures of the daily arrivals in Alexandria have fallen steadily during the last few weeks. In Upper Egypt the ginning factories now work intermittently, as their stocks of cotton are approaching exhaustion. The future course of prices will naturally be governed principally by the commercial demand during the coming months, but whatever this demand is going to be we consider the risk of a considerable drop in prices rather remote in view of the strength of the statistical position. The week's arrivals amount to 199,028 krs., against exports 95,990 krs.; the stock stands at 2,250,630 krs.

Spot.—We have had another broken week owing to the New Year holidays, but a fair volume of business has been put through, and sales for the four business days amount to about 15,700 bales, of which we estimate 8,800 bales Sakellaridis, 6,800 Uppers, 50 bales Brown and Pilion, and 50 bales White. Arrivals are rather less than last week, but still fairly large, but exports are considerably less than last week, and the stock shows a fair increase.

Sakellaridis: Business has been done in all styles, but mainly in the grades from good fair to fully good fair good. For good and better and for cotton below good fair there is only a small inquiry. Prices of spot against contracts are dearer than last week for good fair and upwards, whilst below good fair they are without much change, but inclined to ease.

Uppers.—All styles have been dealt in, with rather more inquiry for fully good fair, and better than for cotton below fully good fair. Prices of spot against contracts are appreciably dearer than last week for good and above; for fully good fair they are without change, and for cotton below fully good fair they are rather easier.

Brown and Pilion.—A small business has been done. Prices of spot against contracts are rather dearer for good, without change for fully good fair, and rather easier for cotton below fully good fair.

White.—A retail business has been done. Prices of spot against contracts are generally rather dearer than last week.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Improvement in Inquiry.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended January 9:—

Egyptian Spot.—Following the break of a penny farthing per lb. which followed immediately on our last report, our market began to display a much healthier tone, which continued throughout the week, coupled with a more or less advancing tendency. This change of sentiment has come about owing to a fairly general feeling that the uncertainties of the political situation have already been largely discounted, and reports of a better state of affairs prevailing in Manchester. During the last two days, especially, the inquiry has shown a distinct improvement, and rather more actual business has been booked, but it cannot yet be said that any definite buying movement has made its appearance. The only fresh features which have appeared to modify the spot situation have been (1) a hardening in the values of the finer grades (particularly in Sakellaridis) as compared with grades of good and below, and (2) the breaking of the basis for untenderable qualities by a flood of cheap offers from Egypt. We regard the importation of this low cotton this year as being fraught with considerable risk. In the first place, there is no genuine hedge for it, and, secondly, times have changed in the last twelve months. In the early part of last year, spinners, generally speaking, would buy anything provided the price suited them. They have, in the majority of cases, improved their position since those days, and far more attention is being paid to-day to the grade and quality of the cotton purchased. This means that, unless some unlooked-for wave of panic buying swept over the market and carried off all the good fair and fully good fair cotton, an importer might have to carry his holding for months, even into the next crop, before he was able to dispose of his stock. Considerably more interest has been shown this week in Sakellaridis cotton fully good fair to good, and the "off" enquiries have not been much in evidence. Roughly speaking, "75—150 on" has been the popular range. On the other hand, the basis for Uppers appears to have weakened somewhat, although prices for this commodity are certainly irregular and show a disposition to fluctuate rather wildly at the moment. Brown, White, and Sudan cottons of any variety have all been neglected. C.i.f. business has shown some slight improvement during the last day or two, a direct reflection of the better feeling prevalent in Manchester. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending 4th inst. were returned as 9,923 bales. Estimated sales, 1,800 bales Egyptian and 150 bales Sudan. Quotations of Upper are reduced 80 points (extra fine 70 points) since last week's circular. Sakellaridis shows a decline of 90 points for good and below; 65 points for fine, whilst extra fine is actually unchanged on the week. In Brown good fair to fine is 80 points lower; fair is 45 points lower; and extra fine 70 points lower on the week. Fully good fair Sakellaridis to-day is 23.60d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Large Inquiry for Cloth.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended January 12 states:—

The market can now be said to have settled down to business after the Christmas and New Year holidays, and during the past week inquiry for cloth has been on a large scale and well spread over the various foreign markets. Unfortunately the prices offered are almost uniformly on too low a basis in the first place, and, whilst some are subsequently raised to figures which are accepted, although only showing the smallest profit or even, in many cases, an actual loss, most of them never materialised into actual business. This is particularly the case as regards India.

Yarn.—There is a very poor tone in this section. The output is not being cleared, and stocks are therefore again accumulating. Generally speaking, spinners have lost ground during the last few weeks, and it is already being stated in some quarters that the abandonment of organised short time was a mistake. The Egyptian spinning section is also experiencing a slower demand. Shipments during December were 11,136,500 lb., against 14,619,500 lb. in November and 11,711,600 lb. in December, 1922.

Cloth.—A considerable inquiry has been experienced, originating from many centres abroad, of which India is decidedly the chief. As mentioned above, however, prices are very unsatisfactory, and by no means sufficient orders are finding their way on to the books. Very little transpires from Egypt or the Near East, and the home trade is exceptionally quiet. Shipments last month were 325,100,000 square yards, against 349,197,400 square yards in November and 360,517,300 square yards in December, 1922.

Raw Cotton.—An easier tendency has manifested itself following the issue of the American ginning report. Based on this, it is hoped that the crop will be somewhat larger than was estimated in the last Bureau report. Imports have been fairly large. Only a quiet business has taken place in Egyptian. Closing prices yesterday were as follows:—American fully middling, 19.82d.; Egyptian fully good fair, 23.10d.

LONDON PRODUCE REPORT.

Demand for Dried Fruit.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday Morning.

Sugar.—Home refined has continued in fair request at unchanged prices. Tate's cubes have been done at 63s., London granulated has come to business at 60s. 1½d., while Lyle's granulated is 60s. 4½d. Foreign descriptions have been variable. West Indian is 1s. 6d. down at 28s., while White Java at 58s. 1½d., is 4½d. up. Futures are hard. Quotations are:—March, 28s. 8½d.; May, 27s. 9d.; August, 27s. 6d.

Coffee.—A firmer tendency has been in evidence, and prices show an advance all along the line. East Indian is 1s. up at 111s., Costa Rica has gained a similar amount at 109s., Nairobi at 101s. is 1s. up, while Santos, continuing its steady rise, has reached 73s.

Dried Fruit.—The market has generally been very firm. An active business has been carried on in the leading varieties of currants, and prices have tended to advance. Sultanas are also harder, there being a considerable demand for this commodity and for currants for the Continent. Plums have been the medium of considerable business, and it is becoming more and more evident that the market for this commodity is expanding. Dates continue in good request, while business in figs has been very active, and higher prices are to be looked for in the near future.

Green Fruit.—Oranges continue in rather poor request for the home trade; but there is a fairly brisk demand for abroad. Quotations are:—Valencias, boxes (240's to 504's), 9s. to 22s. 6d.; Jaffas, boxes (144's to 152's), 16s. 6d. to 17s. 6d. There has not been much doing as regards lemons, and the market remains weak, though this may be only a passing phase. Quotations are:—Cases (300's), 15s. to 18s. 6d.; boxes (300's), 11s. to 13s. 6d. A more animated demand has been experienced for apples, and prices have advanced.

Oilseeds.—Linseed has hardened. Indian, at 21s. 9d., is 2s. 6d. up, while La Plata at 18s. 10½d., shows a gain of 1s. Cottonseed has been steady. Sakellarides is unchanged at 12s. 6d. Rapeseed has been firm, with Toria 6d. up at 19s. 6d. and real bold Ferozepore 1½d. up at 19s. 6d.

Seed Oils.—Linseed has eased off a trifle, and at 43s. is 6d. down. Rape oil has firmed up, crude being 45s., a gain of 6d., while technical refined is 47s. 6d., also 6d. up. Cotton oil has been firm. Refined common edible is 6d. up at 48s. 6d., Bombay crude is unchanged at 42s., Egyptian crude has gained 6d. at 43s. 6d., technical is unchanged at 46s., while deodorised is the same at 50s.

Oil Cakes.—The market has been weak. Linseed cake is 5s. down at 280s., coconut cake, at 195s., is 15s. down, while cottonseed cake is 5s. lower at 175s.

SMYRNA FRUIT MARKET.

Messrs. C. J. Giraud and Co., of Smyrna, report as follows for the week ended December 29:—

The arrivals of sultanas in the Smyrna market since the opening of the season are estimated at 34,100 tons, and the sales are put at 32,120 tons. Business has been interfered with by the holidays. The general tone is bullish, and indications point to dealers asking for higher prices after the turn of the year. The market is feeling the shortage of supplies.

SYRIAN MARKET FOR UNDERWEAR.

The Syrian imports of underwear are estimated at about $132,000 yearly (says an American Consular Report). Knitted underwear is used by the relatively small portion of the population who have adopted foreign styles of dress, but the demand for this type may be expected to increase as standards of living improve. Last year a small supply of American fleece-lined and heavy cotton shirts was introduced, but at present there does not appear to be any of these on the market, which, it would seem, is open for the introduction of these goods, in so far as other conditions permit. At present Italy is more active in supplying lines of cotton underwear, and England features the wool trade.

TENDERS INVITED.

Tenders are invited for the following contracts, and must be made by the dates mentioned.

(Particulars of tenders marked D.O.T. are to be obtained from the Department of Overseas Trade, 35, Old Queen Street, S.W.)

Egypt.

Transmission Line and Distribution System.—The Egyptian Ministry of the Interior invites tenders for the supply, delivery, and erection of transmission lines and distribution system in connection with the Fayoum hydro-electric plant. March 1. (D.O.T.)

Hydro-Electric Plant.—The Egyptian Ministry of the Interior invites tenders for the supply, delivery, and equipment for a hydro-electric plant for Fayoum. March 1. (D.O.T.)

Various Goods.—The Ministry of Education invites tenders for the supply of various goods for the services of public instruction. The range of goods includes cotton sheeting, bleached calico, tulle, tape, serviettes and towels, blankets, plates, china and enamelled, aluminium cups, metal spoons, etc. Tenders must reach the Central Stores, Ministry of Education, Cairo, not later than February 9. (D.O.T.)

Cable advice received by Steaua Romana (British) states that Steaua Romana well No. 246 at Runcu is now flowing 300 tons a day.

The traffic receipts of the Egyptian Delta Light Railways for the ten days ended December 20 amounted to £E12,287, making the total from April 1 £E231,196.

THE INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT OF INDIA.

No economic movement in recent years has been more striking than the rapid growth of industry in India since 1914. Sir Rajendra Nath Mookerjee, K.C.I.E., reviews the position in that country, in an article on "The Present Economic Condition of India," in the Asiatic Review, in which he says:—

The Great War brought about results within a few years which otherwise would have needed a generation to fructify. Drastic changes in the economic and financial outlook of India became necessary as a direct corollary of world-events over which India had no control. The cessation of hostilities found India ready for a great industrial push, for which intensive preparations had been made during the years of struggle and necessity. Relieved from war's burdens, the need for careful discrimination seemed to disappear. India plunged blindly into the vortex of company promotion on a scale that no one dared to dream of in pre-war years. Over-speculation and over-trading in 1919 brought about the usual Nemesis. Chaotic conditions in Europe, combined with an acute failure of the monsoon in 1920, brought about a reaction, from the effects of which India is still struggling. No stable country shows in her international trade such violent fluctuations as India has done during the post-war years. A favourable balance of trade of Rs. 119 crores to India's credit for the year 1919-20 was converted into an adverse balance of Rs. 78 crores in 1920-21. The fall in the exchange rate from 2s. 10½d. to 1s. 5d. within the course of a few months in 1920 was the inevitable result of the violent fluctuation in her foreign trade. The failure of wages to equal the rise in cost of living produced, for the first time in the history of Indian industries, labour troubles on a considerable scale. Political incidents complicated the economic position. The reaction produced a complete stagnation in business within the country. Signs are forthcoming, however, that the corner has been turned. The year 1922-23 shows once more a favourable balance of trade amounting to Rs. 90 crores, though this was reduced to Rs. 28 crores by very heavy imports of gold (41 crores) and silver (18 crores). Unemployment and distress, however, remain acute, for confidence is shy of growth. The deep slough of depression appears to have passed, but careful reconnaissance is needed for complete emergence. The real post-war adjustment is perhaps now in progress. Although the highly satisfactory settlement with Turkey and the Far East will tend to hasten its movement, the difficult and almost chaotic conditions on the European Continent may seriously retard it. India cannot get away from the influence of world factors, and must try to understand and appreciate her position in the economy of the commercial world and throw her weight in favour of a speedy reversion to normal conditions of harmony and goodwill.

India is predominantly an agricultural country. About 70 per cent. of her population derive their livelihood from land; 260 million acres out of a total area of 960 million acres are under crops. Advocates of Indian industrialisation have often failed to grasp the fundamental fact of the economics of India that for generations to come agriculture will remain the chief occupation of her people. I do not mean to suggest that there is any conflict between agricultural and industrial development. For I consider agriculture to be the basic industry of a nation, and, as such, embraced within the sphere of industrialisation. The ideal is to secure the fullest possible use of the land for the production of food and raw materials by means of an ever-diminishing proportion of human labour. The method is the application of scientific research to agriculture.

Agriculture in India is still of an archaic type; primitive and crude appliances are used where more modern types could multiply the yield of the land; the ignorance of the cultivator combines with the rigidity of custom to prevent the rapid introduction of newer methods. Of recent years, however, partly as a result of competition in marketing, partly of the praiseworthy propaganda of the Government Agricultural Departments, and in part as an indirect effect of the widened basis of occupation arising from the opening up of manufacturing industries, and also to a general diffusion of knowledge concerning the outside world, the methods of Indian agriculture are being gradually adapted to modern conditions. Increased means of communication—roads, railways, and canals—have brought the farmer nearer the towns and markets, and increased his knowledge of the outer world. A tendency toward specialisation of crops is distinctly observable. The Government Departments have directed particular attention to this feature. Land which has been found peculiarly adapted for the growth of cotton is now reserved for that purpose. The result is a bigger yield per acre and improved strains. It has been found possible to grow the longer American staple in the Punjab. The average yield per acre is still very poor, being between 75 and 100 lbs. only, as compared with 180 lbs. in U.S.A. and 360-400 lbs. in Egypt. With the formation of a Central Cotton Committee, to act as the connecting link between agricultural departments and the cotton trade, it may be expected that an impetus will be given to the improvement of cotton production in India. The question is of Imperial interest, for India is the second largest producer of raw cotton in the world, America being by far the biggest producer.

The effect of war on agriculture was slight, except where (as in the Punjab) the agricultural villages formed the chief recruiting centres for the Army. The general rise of prices benefited the agriculturist, but this benefit vanished rapidly as the prices of other commodities rose. Migration to the towns in search of factory employment was more noticeable during the years immediately following the termination of hostilities. The Indian ryot still suffers from great poverty and consequent indebtedness to usurious moneylenders. The spread of co-operative credit has relieved the burden a little, and it is a welcome sign that the agriculturist has learned to look with interest on schemes of co-operative production and selling. His traditional instinct inclines him to view with favour communal methods, and the co-operative movement has a great and splendid future in India. That the conservatism of the Indian peasant is a bar to progress is no longer true. Indian agriculture is capable of vast improvement; the chief requirements are provision of cheap finance, better marketing, and more knowledge, coupled with enlightened tenancy legislation.

A British Consulate is to be opened at Reichenberg, Czecho-Slovakia.

Sir Thomas H. Holland, F.R.S., Rector of the Imperial College of Science and Technology, will preside at a meeting of the Royal Society of Arts (Indian Section) next Friday, 18th inst., when Colonel H. L. Crosthwait, late Superintendent, Survey of India, will read a paper on "The Survey of India." The chair will be taken at 4.30 p.m.

COMPANY NOTES AND REPORTS.

Ionian Bank.

The report of the Ionian Bank for the year ended August 31, 1923, states that the profits, after providing for expenses, losses, all bad and doubtful debts, bonus for staff, income-tax and corporation tax, etc., was £49,644, plus £11,813 brought in, making £61,457. The directors propose a final dividend at 3s. per share, free of tax, making 6s. per share, and a bonus at 1s. per share, free of tax, transferring to reserve (making that fund £170,000) £15,000, and carrying forward £12,466. The rate of exchange for the conversion of drachma accounts in the balance-sheet has been taken at drs. 257 per pound, being the rate on August 31, 1923; but, notwithstanding this further depreciation and the disturbed condition of affairs in the Near East, the directors report that the operations continue to show a satisfactory expansion. The directors state that the investments stand on the books at figures well below the actual market value. Meeting, Basildon House, Moorgate, E.C., January 22, 11 a.m.

Westminster Bank.

The net profits of Westminster Bank, after providing for bad and doubtful debts and all expenses, amount to £1,804,783, compared with £1,888,021. Adding £536,585 brought forward there is available the sum of £2,341,368. The dividend of 10 per cent. paid in August last on the £20 shares and 6¼ per cent. on the £1 shares absorbs £631,269. A further dividend of 10 per cent. is proposed in respect of the £20 shares, making 20 per cent. for the year, and a further dividend of 6¼ per cent. on the £1 shares, making the maximum of 12½ per cent. for the year.

Imperial Bank of India.

The net profits of the Imperial Bank of India for the half-year ended December 31, 1923, amounted to Rs. 49,13,400, which with Rs. 19,07,800 brought forward gives a total of Rs. 68,21,200. The Governors have declared a dividend of 16 per cent. per annum, free of tax, absorbing Rs. 45,00,000, transferred to reserve fund Rs. 10,00,000, to pension fund Rs. 3,00,000, carrying forward Rs. 10,21,200.

East Indian Railway.

The report of the East Indian Railway Company for the half-year ended September 30, 1923, states that the gross receipts amounted to Rs. 7,77,47,543, the net earnings being Rs. 3,25,39,207. The company's share of the net earnings, after deducting Rs. 54,197 for Indian income and supertaxes, is Rs. 3,26,686, or at the contract rate of exchange £27,224. The directors recommend a dividend (subject to English income-tax) of 6s. 3d. per cent. on the capital represented by the deferred annuity and the deferred annuity class D. This, with 3s. 9d. per cent. in respect of the amount received as compensation on account of income-tax, will make 10s. in all, in addition to the guaranteed interest of £2 per cent.

G.I.P. Railway.

The report of the Great Indian Peninsula Company for the half-year ended September 30, states that the net revenue, excluding State lines, was Rs. 1,43,10,053, an increase of Rs. 50,64,752. Total interest charges absorbed Rs. 4,57,965 more at Rs. 1,81,05,507, leaving the deficit at Rs. 37,95,454, as against Rs. 84,02,241 at September 30, 1922.

Rohilkund and Kumaon Railway.

The report of the Rohilkund and Kumaon Railway for the year ended September 30 states that the gross receipts were Rs. 62,55,170, working expenses Rs. 35,28,388, and net receipts Rs. 27,26,782. The ratio of working expenses was 56.41 per cent., against 56.61 per cent. The net receipts in sterling were £86,530, against £91,566 in 1922. An interim dividend for March half-year of 4 per cent., plus a bonus of 1 per cent. on the ordinary stock, was paid in July last. The balance from last year, £31,700, makes the total, after deductions, £42,102. The directors recommend a final dividend of 4 per cent., plus a bonus of 2 per cent., on the ordinary stock, less tax at 2s. 6d. in the £, making 11 per cent. for the year, carrying forward £21,102.

The British Empire Exhibition offices have been transferred from 16, Grosvenor Gardens to Wembley.

The production by the British Burmah Company and the Rangoon Company in December amounted to 59,667 barrels.

Reuter's Constantinople correspondent, in a message dated January 14, states:—The Budget for 1923-24 was to-day submitted to the National Assembly at Angora. Expenditure is estimated at 129,000,000 liras, national defence figuring at 32,500,000 liras. Receipts are estimated at 121,000,000 liras, including a special item for alcohol of 5,000,000, thus confirming the intention of the Government to revise the Prohibition Law.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

M. Venizelos in Greece.

Circumstances have fortunately defeated M. Venizelos's intention to refuse to exercise the power with which his unique position in Greece invests him. He is now in office, and although he continues to preach and to practise reconciliation, he appears to be keeping the firm hand on the situation that the occasion requires. Thus the plébiscite which is to decide whether Greece becomes a republic or remains a monarchy is to be postponed for two or three months, and the Prime Minister has given what amounts to a personal guarantee that the appeal to the electorate shall be absolutely impartial. He refuses, it is true, to recall King George II. before the plébiscite is taken, a decision which, together with his repeated declarations of his own preference for a republic, seems to the royalists to be weighting the scales against them; but, on the other hand, he has announced that in his opinion Greece would not be justified in abandoning the monarchical system with less than a 70 or 75 per cent. vote in favour of a republic. Not the least hopeful symptom is the outspoken way in which M. Zaimis, a whole-hearted monarchist, but always the most unselfish of Greek politicians, is seconding the Prime Minister's efforts. M. Venizelos, he points out, is master of the situation. His opponents must bear in mind the dangers to which the eventual failure of his efforts would expose the country. Speaking at a time when M. Venizelos still refused to take office, and being in ignorance of the reason for the refusal, M. Zaimis urged that the only man who could bring the country together should be given a free hand to act as he thought fit, and should have the support of his political opponents no less than of his friends. This appeal of M. Zaimis is, in view of all the circumstances, probably one of the happiest features in the history of a century of Greek politics, and deserves wider recognition than it seems to have obtained. Unfortunately, there are still prominent monarchists who refuse to follow the lead that he has given them.

Recognition by Great Britain.

The hope which we had entertained that Great Britain, in part responsible for Greece's misfortunes, would make her contribution to the healing of the political breach in the country by the manner of her renewal of diplomatic relations has not been fulfilled. As soon as M. Venizelos had accepted the office of Prime Minister Great Britain formally accorded her recognition to the Greek Government, and is once more to be represented by a Minister in Athens. It was essential that diplomatic relations with Greece should be resumed without delay, and there may have been physical difficulties in recognising a sovereign "on leave of absence"; but it should have been possible in one and the same Note to have indicated that, as far as Great Britain was concerned, the past was entirely blotted out, and to have included the hitherto unrecognised King in the recognition. The Royalist Press, we are told, attempts to minimise the importance of the recognition by pointing out that, as long as the Government is not recognised by the Greek people, the action of Great Britain counts for nothing. This is extremist pique; but behind it lies the not unnatural feeling that the nation is always greater than any single member, however important and exalted he may be. The British people has never been called upon to acquiesce in the contention that it has no existence outside the person of a single individual; but it would most certainly resent the insult, even if the individual in question had been Mr. Lloyd George. Both Britain and France, however, have for years been at pains to drum it into the Greeks that there is no Greece outside M. Venizelos. This short-sighted action has played its part in the hostility of his fellow-countrymen against his own person, of which M. Venizelos has had to complain. Cassius as a type still lives:

> When could they say, till now, that talk'd of Rome,
> That her wide walks encompass'd but one man?
> Now is it Rome indeed, and room enough,
> When there is in it but one only man.

The Adriatic Agreement.

The announcement of a "treaty of alliance" between Italy and Yugoslavia which the Yugoslav Foreign Minister made at the recent meeting of the Little Entente at Belgrade is resented in Italian official circles as being premature. It is not difficult to understand the temptation under which M. Nintchitch laboured, and he can, doubtless, disclaim responsibility for the annotations upon his bald disclosure. In any case, it required nothing less than a treaty with Italy to offset the annoyance that the scrapping of the Treaty of Rapallo would otherwise have provoked in Croatia. It is now stated that there are to be three Conventions between Italy and Yugoslavia. The first deals with Fiume; the city with the coastal corridor is to be annexed to Italy, while the port of Barrosh and the Delta go to Yugoslavia, to whom will be leased for a yearly payment one of the Fiume docks. The second Convention is regarded by the Italian Government as a pact of friendship rather than as the treaty of alliance that it was represented to be in Yugoslavia. In effect it appears to be a pact of non-aggression, binding each country not to attack the other, and to remain neutral in the event of the other being attacked by a third. Immediately after these two political Conventions have been signed a commercial treaty is to be concluded between the two countries. The effect on the future of Fiume of the agreement regarding that town will be shown by the event. Apart from that point, the two countries are to be congratulated on the removal of all present causes of friction between them, whatever term may be applied to the understanding that brings them together. As far as Yugoslavia is concerned, there can be little doubt that the end in view—a detente with Italy—justified a modification of the Treaty of Rapallo.

Britain and Turkey.

The formal steps towards the establishment of normal and, it is to be hoped, cordial relations between Turkey and Great Britain are now in process of being taken. A Turkish Diplomatic Mission has reached London, and the appointment of the Hon. R. C. Lindsay as the new British representative in Constantinople is announced. More important still, the delay in the opening of the Mosul negotiations is nearing an end. The British representative will be Sir Percy Cox—an excellent selection—and it has been agreed by both the Turkish and British Governments to admit to the discussions an Irak "observer," who is to be the Irak Minister of Defence, General Nuri Pasha. In the meantime the inevitable pinpricks associated with an inexperienced Administration, bent on over-emphasising what nobody dreams of challenging, are reported from Turkey; but annoying as these are at the time, their effect will pass and their number steadily diminish to vanishing point, if too much notice is not paid to them.

Egypt After the Elections.

As a result of the elections in Egypt, the Cabinet of Yehia Pasha has resigned. King Fuad has postponed his acceptance of the resignation until his return from a few days' tour in the Canal zone, but it may be taken for granted that Zaghloul Pasha will become Prime Minister of Egypt before the end of the week. He has condemned Yehia Pasha in unmeasured terms for his alleged subservience to the British point of view; but at the last moment the latter has wrung words of praise even from the extremists among his opponents for taking a page out of Great Britain's book in his scrupulously fair conduct of a general election. In this respect Egypt has set an example to the whole East, as well as to South-Eastern Europe, and it is a good precedent to have established in any country on the threshold of independence. Zaghloul Pasha will do well to follow Yehia Pasha's lead in another direction in his concentration on home questions, so as to ensure that the new Egypt shall not be distracted by foreign affairs—in which term the Sudan is to be included—from the more important matters that she has in hand. It is a sound move that the Diplomatic Missions that have recently arrived at their respective destinations are regarded as representatives of King Fuad, and, therefore, above political changes in Egypt. The care exercised in the selection of the Mission to the Court of St. James' is of the best augury for the future of Anglo-Egyptian relations.

Cyprus.

An article on Cyprus elsewhere in this issue calls attention to the unsatisfactory state of the island. There can be little doubt that Cyprus has not received from British administration the full benefit that it ought to have received, and for this unhappy position it has largely to thank those who have preferred to agitate for political and personal ends rather than to co-operate with the Government for the common good of all Cypriots. To-day, however, acute distress exists in the island, and there is no need to dwell on past mistakes on either side. The agitation has largely spent itself in the face of the stern realities of the present situation. Definite action is required on the part of the Government to save the people from themselves. There would seem to be a general consensus of opinion as to the steps necessary; but unless they are carried through without delay, they may be taken too late. Instances are quoted where a villager's property which should fetch up to £200 has been sold for about £10, to pay a debt of that amount to a usurer, whose original loan was 5s. The condition of the island has been influenced by the general state of the world's trade; but there are special features which should not be beyond the remedial measures of a British Administration.

Indian Politics.

On the surface of Indian politics there have been no important movements of late, and it is not yet possible to speak with certainty regarding what is going on below, but apparently the extremists in the provinces are at present inclined to wait for the results of the action to be taken in the Assembly at Delhi. The project of presenting to Parliament a formal demand for a new Constitution must be regarded as good tactics from the Indian standpoint, because every group stands formally committed to the general idea of speeding up the reforms, and it is most improbable that individuals should come forward to offer opposition, even though they might dislike some of the concrete measures included in the demand. We take it that Parliament would allow such a demand to be examined by the Joint Standing Committee in detail, and in that case there would be time for the new Indian legislators to gain some experience of practical politics, experience which they certainly need. The immediate prospects are then for a period of suspense, with little or no contentious legislation brought forward by the Governments, and budgets framed to give the minimum of provocation; at any rate, there seems to be little hope of anything being done that is really worth doing.

Irresponsible Politicians.

The latest telegrams from Allahabad encourage the hope that the local politicians have finally failed in their attempt to bring about an appalling catastrophe. The magnitude of the danger could scarcely be exaggerated. You have a crowd of half a million or so individuals, unorganised and undisciplined, their religious feelings stirred to the depths by the certainty of attaining salvation, provided that they can bathe in a narrow strip of dangerous water within the very few hours during which its saving virtue lasts. Even in the most favourable circumstances, a wild rush, with deaths by the thousand, is prevented only by the most elaborate precautions, carried out with such precision that people have almost forgotten the recurring panics of old days. To incite a crowd of this sort to defy the regulations by force is about the most wicked conduct it is possible to conceive; but, apparently, the unparalleled liberty of political discussion now enjoyed by India extends even to action of this nature. We are told that the steadiness of the religious leaders present on the spot averted disaster: we may perhaps look forward to a time when they will exercise a similar steadying influence over irresponsible politicians.

The Services Commission.

Lord Lee's Commission on the organisation of the public services has been getting through a vast amount of work, and the progress made up to the Christmas recess seems to justify the hope, which some competent critics laughed to scorn, that its task will be accomplished before Easter. The value of its work cannot be judged by the reports appearing in the Indian Press, which naturally give undue prominence to occasional breezes, and pass lightly over the really important evidence of concrete facts, but from other sources we gather that, while the pace has been tremendous, the inquiry has been thorough, and the members of the Commission, taken as a whole, have impressed the witnesses most favourably by their impartiality and their anxiety to grasp unfamiliar points of view. In the circumstances, it is a great pity that so many Indian politicians should have decided to discredit the Commission before the first sitting took place, but their attitude should be taken merely as evidence of their own inexperience, and it has the advantage of giving the authorities a much freer hand than they would have enjoyed if there had been any prospect of a responsible opposition based on the Commission's report.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

The Railway Strike.

The strike has come, and it is not much good now to set out the rights and wrongs of the case. As far as one can see, it will last as long as the moneys of Mr. Bromley's association hold out—which may be much longer than most people imagine. At all events, the men who have struck must be extremely determined, for they are not receiving much "trade" support, the N.U.R. so far having remained loyal to the behests of Mr. Thomas.

Viewed from a distance, this strike looks like an instance of craft against industry; it is a sort of foretaste of some of the joys that might be experienced when Syndicalists disapprove of Socialism. There is in the railway service a degree of jealousy which few people would suspect.

Passenger services are, at the moment, at any rate, in a rather chaotic condition, and goods services are said to be worse. But, presumably, we shall survive until the inevitable compromise is reached. Both sides begin with grim and large talk, but that has a habit of wearing thin as the weary weeks drag on.

The Conservatives' Last Days.

There was very little to get excited about in the speeches made in Parliament during the last few days of the Conservatives' administration. The Labour amendment was moved in most moderate terms, and the only thing of any note was a fine oration, in quite his pre-War vein, by Mr. Asquith. The Government's reply was poor in the extreme, but the poverty of its speeches was a fair index of the poverty of its case. It went out, wept and sung, it is true, but quite unhonoured. "Admirable fainéants" should be inscribed on its tomb.

But the whole affair was empty of reality. There may be some people who still believe, with Mr. Asquith, that the word "progressive" does really mean something in these days, just as there are still a few nincompoops who still think that the word "constitutional" has significance; but the only truth is that the Labour Party is in, and nobody knows for how long. All the flapdoodle about the rightness of their being where they are owing to the fact that the country gave a vote in favour of "progressive" legislation is excessive.

"Selling the Pass."

A great deal of indignant froth has been indulged by the anti-Labour Press and by some of its less intelligent readers over the decision of the Liberals to let the Socialists in. As the days of the defeat of the Government drew nearer, so their shrieks grew more frantic and agonising. Whether Lord Rothermere, in his extremity, or Lord Beaverbrook, in his anguish, called more loudly on the merciful heavens to witness the treachery, the callousness, nay, the suicide of Mr. Asquith, must be left to the specialists in extravagant superlatives to decide. It was amusing to hear them say that it meant the end of the Liberal Party, at any rate, for this was just what those who supported the policy of Mr. Asquith said would be involved if the Liberals voted against the Labour amendment. Really, one cannot see what the anti-Labour folk have to grumble at if Mr. Asquith sold the pass at the price of his own suicide. Perhaps they believe more strongly in their fears than in their prophecies. We shall wearily see.

Mr. Churchill's Boats Burned.

Mr. Churchill has done it again. In a letter which has been published throughout the Press he has come out vigorously and plausibly against the Socialists, but also, by implication, against the Liberals. His admirers can say that this letter is the inevitable outcome of the attitude which he has for some time adopted, but cynics will say that he has his ear more closely to the ground than the older Liberals, and that he, foreseeing the eventual disappearance of the Liberal Party, is, in short, "not having any." What he wanted was to have an amendment passed to the effect that the House of Commons completely disapproved of a minority Socialist Government, which, he maintains, can but produce "strife and tumult, deepening and darkening."

This letter is, of course, in direct opposition to the counsels of Mr. Asquith and his followers, and it means that Mr. Churchill has burned his boats as far as the Liberal Party is concerned. Where he will ultimately find haven is hard to guess, but in twenty years' time he may well be discovered swimming merrily in the waves of Labour! For, although he is not so unscrupulous as, say, Mr. Lloyd George, he is more versatile. Yet this time, although he undoubtedly has powerful influence behind him, he is to be rather less successful. But his day will come, if he himself survives the dreadful calamities that he predicts as the result of a minority Socialist Government's being in power.

The City By-Election.

None but a City man can understand the workings of a City man's mind, and there is, therefore, no intelligent comment to be made on what appear to the uninitiated to be the absurdities of the City by-election. The answer to the question: "When is a Conservative not a Conservative?" seems to be "When he is a City Conservative." And, similarly, a Liberal is not a Liberal when he is a City

Digitized by Google

Liberal. The Conservative candidate for the City opposed the sitting Conservative member at the last by-election—so that, in face of this unpleasant fact, the City has actually chosen a Liberal candidate! But I do not know whether he will follow Mr. Asquith in not opposing the Socialists. It is difficult, therefore, to predict how this highly complicated bundle of nerves will function on the polling day, which is fixed for the first week of February.

Echoes of Reunion.

There have been a few unimportant, but at the same time significant, echoes of the reunion controversy. For the most part the Nonconformists are responsible for them; it is quite obvious that the Archbishop of Canterbury was very far ahead of the Dissenters in his recent remarks. There is, indeed, a heated proposal for the propagandising of Protestantism in this country, and the claim of the Anglo-Catholics to represent Anglicanism is very warmly disputed.

From the other side comes the news of what, to Westerns, will probably seem a rather regrettable rapprochement. The Armenian Orthodox Church has just issued a decree sanctioning the use of an organ for liturgical purposes. At a time when unaccompanied singing is all the rage, so to speak, and when it is being more fully realised what we ourselves lost by the introduction into our services of the organ, it is a little sad to think that in the name of progress the Armenian Churches are following us. As far as one knows, however, this allowing of the organ does not extend to the Greek and Russian Churches: for our part we hope it never will.

French and German Moneys.

The past week will long be remembered by financiers for the fall in the French franc and the extraordinary prices to which German loans soared. How it all came about no one seems to understand. Amsterdam appears to be getting blamed for both! But the gambling on the German loans went on very merrily for a day or two, which at least meant a very welcome change in the conversation of Stock Exchange men from the eternal anti-Labour talk!

In regard to the franc, however, it is fully realised, in spite of a manifestation of ill-mannered and petty glee, that if the franc is to follow even remotely in the wake of the mark, we are all "for it." These exchanges have made us realise more than any League of Nations could the urgent nature of our interdependence—urgent, that is, for nations which do not support themselves.

England and Wales.

As an offset to the gloom caused by the advent of Labour and by the railway strike, we had during the week-end more heartening matter to read about—I mean the victory of England over Wales at Rugby. There is now no reason, seeing that we have beaten Wales on her own ground, that someone should not timidly suggest that we might even beat Scotland, and, in the summer, at cricket, the South Africans. At all events, any reduction in the number of those who know better than England's Selection Committee is a thing for which to be very grateful!

Commerce and Beauty.

Certain literary men have for long declared that there is a definite connection between modern industrial life and beauty. Poems have, I believe, been written in praise of commerce—not the sort of thing that Mr. Kipling has done so well—but real verse about cranes, escalators, lifts, and so on. In music, of course, they have for many years been writing about the more baneful features of modern life—the Tube at Oxford Circus, the atmosphere at a cinema, and so forth. But now we are to have in real, splendid earnest the charms of modern existence set out before our eyes. Very well-known artists have been engaged by the railway companies to design their advertising pictures, and the whole nature of hoardings is like to be changed.

This, of course, is excellent news, for our big towns were getting quite intolerable in their blatant vulgarity; often one had to flee underground to the Tubes to obtain respite from the blaring world above. If in the future we may in our towns look up, and not be ashamed, life, indeed, will be sweeter. But whether this is because artists cannot make enough by their "legitimate" work, or whether because there is a really popular revolt against unsightly posters, I do not care to say. arises.

ALTER EGO.

THE TURKISH DIPLOMATIC MISSION.

It has not yet been decided whether the respective diplomatic Missions of Turkey and England are to rank as Embassies or as Legations.

The present Turkish Diplomatic Mission, which moved last week from the Langham Hotel into 69, Portland Place, is headed by Youssuf Kemal Bey. Youssuf Kemal Bey, formerly Minister of Foreign Affairs at Angora, is well known in this country, having visited England in 1922.

The Counsellor to the Mission is Youssuf Hikmet Bey, who attended the Lausanne Conference and accompanied his present chief on his visit to London in 1922. He studied Mathematics at the Sorbonne, and was Director of the Political Section of Foreign Affairs at Angora.

Mehmet Kemal Bey, First Secretary, was Assistant Director of the Political Section of Foreign Affairs.

The Second Secretary, Shevki Bey, was Second Secretary at the Turkish Embassy before the War.

Orhan Halid Bey, Third Secretary, was educated at Robert College, Constantinople, and Durham University. He is an engineer, and was in England during the years 1921-22.

The King of the Hejaz, accompanied by the Emir Abdullah, arrived at Amman last week.

A new postage-stamp for 7½ piastres, blue, has been issued by the Turkish Republic bearing the portrait of Ghazi Mustapha Kemal Pasha, the President, and a picture of a broken bridge and a rising sun.

Owing to the postponement of the opening of the new French Courts in Syria to February 1, the British Consular Courts will continue to have jurisdiction until that date in virtue of authority issued on January 16 by Lord Curzon.

It is stated that the Senate of the University of Athens has appointed a committee, composed of the Rector and Professors Andreades and Menardos, to arrange for the commemoration of Byron's centenary. The two professors are leading Anglophils.

GREECE.

Athens, January 11.

M. Venizelos's Return.

After an absence of more than three years, the man who is called "the creator of larger Greece" by his friends, and the "traitor and impostor" by his enemies, has returned to Greece. Desirous of avoiding a popular reception, M. Venizelos had requested the ex-Chief of the Revolution, Colonel Plastiras, to meet him at sea somewhere in the Saronic Gulf in order to disembark at a deserted spot on the Attica coast, whence they would be able to motor to Athens unobserved. The late arrival of the s.s. Andros, however, which brought M. Venizelos from Marseilles, made all these precautions unnecessary, and at 4 a.m. the ex-Premier landed at the New Phaleron Pier and, under cover of darkness, motored to the capital unnoticed.

M. Venizelos's first public appearance was made at the Voulé last Saturday on the occasion of the election of the Speaker. Although the meeting did not open until five o'clock, every inch of space in the Parliament had been taken up since three, while thousands of people who were unable to gain admittance stood for hours outside the building and in the lower part of Homer Street in order to get a glimpse of their idol. When M. Venizelos, looking very pale and aged, appeared in the Chamber he was greeted by a deafening applause and shouts of "Long live Venizelos." No sooner had the House quietened down again when one of the Republican Deputies stood up and in a stentorian voice shouted, "Long live the Republic and down with the Glücksburg dynasty!" The other Republican Deputies joined in, but their shouts were quickly drowned in the renewed cheers for Venizelos of the Liberal members and the crowd.

The Election of the Speaker.

A few hours before last Saturday's meeting it was an understood thing that each of the two parties—the Liberal and the Republican—would put forward the candidature of their own man for the post of the President of the Chamber, the former's candidate being M. Venizelos and the latter's M. Roussos, formerly Greek Ambassador at Washington. The announcement made shortly before the election by M. Papanastasiou, the Chief of the extreme Republicans, to the effect that his party, fully recognising M. Venizelos's valuable services to the country, and realising that he was the most suitable person to hold the Speakership, had decided to withdraw the candidature of their own man and support M. Venizelos, was received, therefore, with no little surprise. This statement, which, it is widely believed, was prompted by fears of the Republicans that their nakedness should be exposed by the election, greatly annoyed Captain Hadjikyriakos, who promptly retorted that the Republican Party should "vote for ideals and not for idols," and that he personally would blackball M. Venizelos. It must be mentioned in parenthesis that the ex-Chief of the Navy has a personal grudge against M. Venizelos dating from the latter's last Premiership, and it is generally supposed that therein should be sought the motive of his unexpected attack. An indescribable pandemonium followed this statement, all the Liberal Deputies shouting and gesticulating simultaneously, and some of them even advancing threateningly towards Captain Hadjikyriakos. At length order was restored, and M. Papanastasiou, speaking on behalf of the Republican Party, declared that what Captain Hadjikyriakos had said represented his own opinion only. The Chamber then proceeded with the election of the Speaker without any further incident, M. Venizelos obtaining 345 out of 356 votes. Before the result of the voting was declared, M. Venizelos felt indisposed, and was assisted home by Dr. Doxiadis, ex-Minister of Public Assistance.

The Ministerial Crisis.

True to his word, M. Venizelos has so far refused the Prime Ministership, but one is apt to wonder whether it will be for long. Prime Ministers seem hard to find in Greece nowadays, not because there is nobody willing to assume that high post, but because there is so much underhand work and jealousy among the leading members of the Liberal Party that the preference of one over another might easily lead to unending trouble. It would surprise nobody, therefore, if M. Venizelos, who is a persona grata with everybody, ultimately agreed to put himself at the head of the Government. As the Conservative-Liberals are supposed to hold the majority in the National Assembly, it was only natural that that party should be entrusted with the formation of the Cabinet. M. Venizelos, however, in his efforts to please everyone, conceived the idea of forming a sort of Coalition Government composed of members from both the Conservative-Liberals and the Liberal-Republicans under the Premiership of the leader of the latter party, M. Roussos, M. Venizelos himself taking over the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. This arrangement, however, did not satisfy the Conservative-Liberals, who informed M. Venizelos that they could not co-operate with a semi-Republican Cabinet, and demanded that a purely Liberal Government be formed under their acting leader, General Danglis. M. Venizelos having agreed to this, General Danglis was to-day summoned by the Regent, Admiral Countouriotis, and requested to submit the list of Ministers within twenty-four hours.

January 12.

The New Cabinet.

Contrary to expectations, the Ministerial crisis ended last night, and M. Venizelos is once more Greece's Prime Minister. Following the refusal of M. Michalacopoulos and M. Kafandaris, two of the most prominent members of the Conservative-Liberal Party, to participate in the proposed Danglis Cabinet, and more especially owing to the threat of the Liberal-Republicans to deny their support to any such Cabinet, General Danglis deposed the mandate. Finding himself in a veritable impasse, and realising the necessity of putting an end to the anomalous situation created by the absence of a responsible Government, M. Venizelos decided to form the new Cabinet himself. Half an hour sufficed to prepare the list of new Ministers and submit it to the Regent for approval, and by eight o'clock last night the Cabinet had already taken the oath "in the name of the King," as well as in the name of the Fatherland.

*Under this heading appear weekly or at regular intervals communications from correspondents in Egypt, the Sudan, Roumania, Yugoslavia, Greece, Bulgaria, Albania, Turkey, Palestine, Irak and Persia.

Of this new Cabinet, M. Roussos, M. Tsouderos, and M. Valalas belong to the Liberal-Republican Party, all the remainder being Conservative-Liberals. Two of the new Ministers, M. Spyridis and M. Michalacopoulos, were members of the Venizelos Cabinet which was compelled to resign after the elections of November 14, 1920. M. Doxiadis was a member of the Revolutionary Government which has now dissolved.

Miscellaneous News.

The ex-Revolutionary leader, Colonel Plastiras, has left for Switzerland after having spent a few days in his native town, Carditsa. Prior to his departure, the Regent conferred upon him the Order of the Grand Cross of the Saviour. A similar decoration has been awarded to the ex-Premier, Colonel Gonatas.

The Constituent Assembly will meet again on the 21st inst. It will proceed with the election of the new Speaker, M. Venizelos subsequently asking for a vote of confidence.

It is announced that one of the first measures of the new Government will be to grant general amnesty to all political and military prisoners in any way connected with the recent counter-revolutionary movement. Should General Metaxas be included in this amnesty, he will be free to return to Greece.

M. Venizelos has conferred with many of the anti-Venizelist leaders, including M. Triantafyllakos, M. Kalageropoulos, M. Zaimis, and the ex-Mayor of Athens, M. Merkouris. They have all advised M. Venizelos to recall King George and Queen Elisabeth before a plebiscite is held.

ROUMANIA.

Bucharest, January 12.

Political Matters.

The Parliamentary vacation began last Saturday (January 5), preceding the Greek Orthodox Christmas, which began on January 7 (O.S. December 25). This year the Greek Orthodox Church will have to celebrate two Christmases, because the unification of the Greek calendar with the Gregorian will take place on November 24, 1927. The Parliamentary vacation will last until the end of February.

During this time political life is at a standstill; only the newspapers show any activity. The rival journals of the People's Party (which has split into two), the Indreptarea and the Indrumarea, throw an interesting light upon the situation. Nobody appears to know what will happen at the reopening of Parliament, and consequently politicians are being very circumspect in their utterances.

I have had the opportunity of a conversation with Dr. Aurel Lazar, a prominent member of the National Party (in Opposition) upon the general position. He said that the National Party was proceeding determinedly to its goal. Upon the changes that have recently taken place in the Averescu Party he would not say much, but he emphasised the point that it was quite out of the question that M. Mihalache should work with the Averescu Party. He denied that the Peasant Party was a Bolshevist one, any more than the National Party was Republican—such labels were supplied by political opponents. First the Nationals were called "regionalists," then "traitors," and finally, "republicans"; but such charges were not worth refuting.

The Liberal Party, after splitting the Averescu Party into two, wishes to pass those fundamental laws resting on the Constitution, which came into force some month ago. Immediately after the opening of the Chamber of Deputies the new law relating to the organisation of the Ministries will be voted, in addition to some laws of a financial character, such as the law on mining, which deals with the nationalisation of the sub-soil. This is certain to provoke heated discussion. Further, the Government intends to carry the laws on the reform of administration, the reform of public instruction, the ecclesiastical reform, the Code of Work, and the law relating to co-operative societies. It is determined that these laws shall remain for a very long time the coping-stone of the political life of Roumania, and that, whatever parties rule the country in the future, they will be obliged, willy-nilly, to apply the laws now to be voted.

Roumania and Russia.

The Roumanian and Russian Missions negotiating in Odessa have signed the Treaty containing the commercial agreement between the two States. The Bucharest Government has already received a copy of the memorandum, from which it appears that the agreement will come into force only after the regulation of some disputable questions of political nature. These details are to be discussed at the Conference in Salzburg, where Roumania will be represented by M. Diamandi and Russia by M. Litvinoff. If the negotiations are successful with regard to the Bessarabian frontier, the Russians will establish in Bucharest a Legation, called Red House, and commercial consulates in Galatz, Kishenev, and Czernovitza. Roumania, on the other hand, will establish a Legation in Moscow, and commercial representation in Odessa, Moscow, and Petrograd. The two Missions have agreed upon the frontier stations: these are to be Tighina, Cetatea Alba, and Anokil.

The Northern Oil Concession.

At last, after negotiations lasting nearly two years, the concession for exploiting four out of the five Northern provinces has been definitely granted to the American Sinclair Company. The Mejliss as long ago as November, 1921, authorised the granting of the oil concession of the whole of the five provinces to an independent American company, and the matter has been discussed and thrashed out almost ad nauseam by the several Governments which have been in power since that time and periodically dropped and resuscitated until the present Prime Minister, Sardar Sepah, definitely signed the concession in favour of the Sinclair Company, who have accepted the terms laid down by the last Parliament after long negotiations. It was at first stipulated that an immediate loan of anything up to 10 million dollars should be dependent on the granting of the concession, but this seems to have been waived latterly, and no mention is at present made of such an advance, as apparently Dr. Millspaugh, the Administrator-General of the Finances, prefers to attempt to balance his Budget without the help of an external loan. The present concession applies to the provinces of Mazanderan, Azerbaijan, Astrabad and Khorassan, the fifth province, Ghilan, being reserved, according to the Mejliss' decision, for exploitation by a purely Persian company, which, it is reported, is to be formed by one of the most important merchants here, Haji Moin ut Tujjar, who already has the concession for oxide in the Persian Gulf, and who has applied for the Ghilan Oil Concession.

The granting of the concession undoubtedly marks a very important step towards the improvement of Persia's economic situation, and the Government is already stated to be taking steps towards the employment in the northern oilfields of the large number of unemployed in the country. The granting of the concession will apparently have to be ratified by the new Mejliss as soon as it assembles, and to this end urgent steps are being taken by the Prime Minister to hasten the arrival in the capital of a sufficient number of the newly-elected Deputies to form a quorum (half the total number plus one), and so to allow of the opening of the fifth term of the Parliament. The number of the Deputies who have arrived in Teheran is now not far short of the required limit, and the new Mejliss may, therefore, be expected to open very shortly.

The Japanese Mission.

The Japanese Mission is receiving marked attention and being cordially welcomed here. They were the guests of the Foreign Office at a luncheon last Friday given in their honour, at which the Prime Minister and Cabinet were present, and the British Minister a few days ago entertained them to lunch to meet the representatives of the British firms and institutions here.

Suppressing Insurrection.

The Government troops have recently gained marked successes against rebellious tribesmen in different parts of the country, and although these disturbances have only been of minor importance, the restoration of order in the affected districts has greatly added to the army's prestige and gone a long way towards making the Central Government respected. A few days ago the troops occupied Khoramabad, which had been in the hands of the Lur tribesmen for some time. This tribe have always been a disturbing element in the west, and it is to be hoped that this latest success of the Government forces will teach them a salutary lesson and induce them to keep the peace in future, and prevent their annual raids and depredations on the neighbourhood.

A New Highway.

A new commercial highway linking the Persian Gulf with the capital is now in course of construction by the Government in this neighbourhood from Dizful to Khoramabad, and security in this district is essential to its importance. This road will thence join the existing high road to Sultanabad and Kum and on to Teheran, and the new route should prove invaluable as a commercial artery from the north to the south.

Persia and Britain.

The recent murders of British officers on the frontiers of Afghanistan, and the British Government's demand from the Ameer's Government for co-operation in the apprehension of the murderers, distorted by the Moscow wireless into an ultimatum insisting on the rupture of relations between Afghanistan and the Soviet Government, have been eagerly seized on by the gutter Press, and a section of the priests, headed by Khalessizadeh, son of the deported Irak clerical, who was recently here and is now on his way to Meshed, for a fresh denunciation of British anti-Islamic policy, and meetings and demonstrations of protest organised by Khalessizadeh have been held, but have met with very little success or enthusiasm.

The Anglo-Persian Shares.

The recent questions in the House of Commons with regard to the reported intention of the British Government to dispose of its holding in the Anglo-Persian Oil Company have naturally been followed here with much interest and a certain amount of anxiety, and open letters have been addressed in the Press to the company's representative in Teheran calling for an explanation, especially in view of the company's decreased dividend this year from 20 per cent. to 10 per cent. The oil company's profits are of great importance to the Persian Government, as the royalties derived therefrom are one of the Treasury's most reliable sources of income each year, and any diminution in this respect is naturally a matter of great concern to the Government.

The National Exhibition.

The National Exhibition was closed last week, after being open for a month and a half. The financial result is not yet known; but there is no doubt that it has engendered a great deal of interest in the arts and industries, as well as the natural resources of the country, and its promoters deserve due praise for their ambitious enterprise.

A Chaplaincy for Teheran?

The Bishop in Persia, the Right Rev. J. H. Linton, has paid us in Teheran a short visit from Ispahan, and took the services during Christmas week in the chapel of the American Presbyterian Mission. His visit was connected principally with the proposed foundation of a British chaplaincy in Teheran. This question has been mooted several times in past years, and I understand that originally the British community were offered the choice between a doctor or a chaplain attached to the Legation, and chose a healer of bodies in preference to a healer of souls. The number of the British colony is, however, steadily increasing, now exceeding 200, and it is felt that the time has come for renewed efforts to obtain offers of annual donations or subscriptions from the British Government, institutions, and private individuals to make a chaplaincy self-supporting. For the past, English Protestants have been indebted for their religious services to the American Presbyterian Mission, who have always had a Church of England service on Sunday mornings during the winter months in the pleasant chapel built by them in the Mission compound; this has been greatly appreciated by the community here, who would otherwise have been deprived entirely of religious reunion.

CYPRUS IN 1923.

While the state of the island justifies some anxiety, it must be said that the situation is attributable in no small degree to the very unwise tactics of the party which has for so many years carried on an agitation for union with Greece. Instead of working for the real interests of the island, they have subordinated these to political aims and propaganda. It is unquestionable that a great deal has been left undone which might have been done during the last twenty years had Greek members of the Legislative Council co-operated loyally with the Government instead of wasting time by captious opposition and obstruction in the vain pursuit of a premature and mistaken ideal. Their action has, indeed, tended to injure and delay the cause which they profess to have in view. The recent mission of M. Spyro Araousos to London represented a very forlorn hope, and the Secretary of State having pointed out how utterly inappropriate was the movement at the present time, and having stated definitely that the "question" of union must now be regarded as closed, it might well be supposed that the Greeks would at last recognise the futility of persistence in the practice of sending periodical deputations to England. And, indeed, information from island sources gave reason to conclude that on the return of M. Araousos the party would drop further agitation and would co-operate in a new spirit with the Government, in order to promote the much-needed welfare of the island. How far this will be carried out remains to be seen. There is a considerable section of the thoughtful element in the Greek community who fully realise that Greece has only too many difficulties of her own, and that, far from having any money to spend on the development of Cyprus, she would rather send a number of needy officials to take up posts in the administration. Many are now in favour of "Home Rule" inside the British Empire, and desire that Cyprus may be granted a "Constitution" similar to that enjoyed by Malta.

Meanwhile a new situation has arisen. The places of the Greek members of Council who so foolishly refused to sit in the Chamber have been filled by candidates belonging chiefly to the agricultural classes, who are regarded by the ex-members (chiefly lawyers and merchants) as quite unqualified to represent island interests. The Press has continued to advocate unabated efforts to uphold national aspirations for union. The Legislative Council has been sitting, and for several weeks has been fighting over the estimates.

Many rumours are current regarding the Council. An impression prevails that it will shortly be dissolved, that there will be a redistribution of electoral divisions by dividing the six administrative districts into sub-districts, that no person who does not reside in a sub-district may stand as candidate to represent it, that British subjects only will be eligible, and that the number of elected Greek members is to be increased from nine to twelve.

The so-called "National Assembly," though still existing, meets but rarely. It has quite lost whatever support it had. The Greeks in general make light of, if they do not actually ridicule, its "resolutions," and it will probably soon fade out of existence.

The year that has just ended has not been a prosperous one. The summer was abnormally protracted. Up to the present there has been hardly any rain (a fraction of an inch as against over seven inches in the corresponding autumn period last year); but it may yet come in time. The peasants, who made much money during the War, are—like so many others—improvident, and they are now faced, as they have always been periodically throughout history, with a state of anxiety and depression. The moneylenders have profited, and the properties of villagers are being sold up at very low prices. At a large meeting held recently at Limassol, chiefly of agriculturists, resolutions were passed praying the Government to adopt measures to suspend the execution of writs for sales of movable and immovable properties, to find a market for Cypriot products, and, above all, to hasten the establishment of an agricultural bank. This desire for an agricultural bank and cheap credit is widespread throughout the island, and is regarded as the one hope of salvation. The Chief Secretary has informed a deputation that the matter is under serious consideration, and no doubt, if such a bank could be established under favourable auspices, it should help very largely to rescue the heavily indebted rural classes from the paralysing grip of the usurer.

At the coming Empire Exhibition Cyprus should make a very creditable show. The Agricultural and Forest Departments have been making excellent efforts, and are sending interesting exhibits. The wines, cigarettes, and asbestos industries of the island will be worthily represented, as well as silk, lace, and other products. Large consignments have already been despatched.

PRESS ON THE NEAR EAST.

Egypt.

The Daily News of January 15 professes exasperation with the "calmness" with which British official circles in Egypt regard the victory of Zaghloul Pasha at the elections. Because—

> If they knew that the country was behind Zaghloul Pasha to this extent, why did they arrest and exile him and his principal supporters? The excuse for this action has been that these men were the factious leaders of a minority of extremists. If that had been so, the policy pursued was explicable, even defensible. But it is now clear that they were nothing of the sort. It is evident that practically the entire Egyptian nation supports Zaghloul; and that being so, the policy pursued was not merely wrong but senseless.

However, if the "calmness" means merely that the official classes accept gracefully "the overwhelming proof of their own error, there is nothing more to be said about it; if it means anything else it is extremely ominous."

The Times of January 15, after pointing out that there is practically no opposition in the new Egyptian Parliament, says:—

> Zaghloul Pasha . . . is a political veteran, but he will have very few men of experience at his side, and he will no doubt have reason to regret that the Opposition is numerically so feeble At any rate, the responsibility for good government in Egypt now lies upon him. He has professed extremist views; he has bitterly attacked the British occupying authorities; he has opposed moderate counsels; and he has won popularity by outbidding all his rivals. He has no rivals now. Egypt is independent, British intervention is reduced to the minimum consistent with the external security of the new State, and the extent of British influence in Egypt is a matter for negotiation and agreement with the independent Egyptian Government. . . . The work of Zaghloul Pasha as leader of a strong Opposition was simple and easy in comparison with the difficult and responsible task that is thrust upon him now of training his clamorous and enthusiastic followers in the technique of legislation, of maintaining order in Egypt, and of dealing with the new complexities of the international situation of his country. By a deliberate act Great Britain has relinquished her Protectorate over Egypt, foreseeing all the possible consequences. In the later stages of British rule Zaghloul was a disturber of order. That will not prevent this country from following with sympathetic interest his efforts to govern Egypt under conditions that he has demanded and desired.

The Westminster Gazette of January 15 states that the extent of Zaghloul Pasha's victory is the reflection of the mistakes made in British policy. It is, it says, impossible to hold Egypt by force. But now that the policy of force has failed, the triumph of Zaghloul Pasha has involved the defeat of many of the ablest men in the country, so that his responsibility is a great one.

The Morning Post, in an article written by "an Anglo-Egyptian," is of the opinion that the Allenby Agreement of February 28 has tended to undo the work of Lords Cromer and Kitchener, because it means a reversion "to the domination by Turkish Pashas." This writer proceeds:—

> The elections mark the growing resentment of the Fellaheen against the replacement of the somewhat cold, but always just, English control by the petty but potent tryanny of officialdom.

The five years after the War show, he says, as far as the British authorities in Egypt are concerned, "a painful record of vacillation and ignorance," which—> culminated in the pitiful surrender of February 28, 1922, which was effected to the consternation of the European and Christian communities, who foresaw the inevitable result. For two years the country has been progressively misruled by the Pashas, and it is probable that Saad, whose health is not what it was, will be unable to stem the tide.

But, he maintains, the power of the Palace Party is rising, and "bids fair to rival Saad in political power," for, though Zaghloul Pasha may have the suffrages of the people, King Fuad controls the executive machine. Between these two parties, he states, there will during the next few months be an inevitable struggle for mastery. His conclusion is that England ought not "to abandon the tender shoots of Egyptian independence without taking steps to be sure that their growth to maturity is protected from destruction by either autocracy or oligarchy."

> The ideals of such men as Saad Pasha, and the integrity of Tewfik Pasha Nessim, his possible nominee, are undoubted, but the forces against them, especially in view of Saad Pasha's failing health, are such as to give rise to grave apprehension. The helping hand of England, whose forty years of honest work have not been forgotten, may yet be called for to assist her former protégé. Let us hope that the cynical policy of "let them stew in their own juice" be repudiated as unworthy and disastrous.

Greece.

The Saturday Review of January 12 points out the difficulty and the danger of the present task of M. Venizelos, and remarks that, if he is successful, he will have little chance of withdrawing from his country:—

> Venizelos is much the greatest Greek of the time. There is no other who can be compared with him, and this being the case, it is possible enough that he may be unable to retire from Greece for a very long time.

The Times of January 16 refers to M. Venizelos's supposed wishes that there should be a 75 per cent. majority before the Greek Constitution can be changed, and that a Senate should be created in Athens. It goes on:—

> Stability and unity are the factors which well-wishers of Greece would most like to see ensured in her national life. For that reason it is unfortunate that ignoble attacks should be made upon M. Venizelos in some quarters since his return. The opponents of the great statesman who is trying to restore order out of chaos are the extremists in either camp. . . . M. Venizelos does not oppose the institution of a Republican régime on principle. But he has made it quite clear from the first that any such change must be brought about, not by a coup d'état in the streets of Athens, but by an orderly and legal expression of the will of the whole country.

After congratulating the Greek Prime Minister upon the work he has already accomplished, it says:—

> That he may carry his task to a successful conclusion is the hearty wish of this country, which sees in M. Venizelos one of the few democratic statesman in Europe who, in spite of some failures, retains a reputation for political acumen and strength of character. To secure political stability and to train men to come after him would be a fitting climax to his dramatic career.

The Indian Elections.

Writing in the Asiatic Review for January on "The Indian Elections and After," Mr. Stanley Rice emphasises the fact that the Indian reforms are an experiment. His conclusion is not without hope:—

> No doubt the franchise has as yet been extended only to a very minute fraction of the population whose voice can in no sense be regarded as the voice of India. But political consciousness must filter down from the more to the less educated. . . . The Indian peasant is a shrewd enough fellow in all that concerns his personal interests, and all accounts from India agree that the masses have been stirred by recent events as never before in history.

THE REMINISCENCES OF AN ASSYRIOLOGIST.

"REMINISCENCES." By A. H. Sayce. (London: Macmillan. 18s. net.)

The Reverend A. H. Sayce, one of the most eminent Assyriologists of all time, has here provided in his memoirs not a great book, but a very interesting and entertaining one. It is a rambling, discursive narrative, but packed, although not so fully as the author would have liked, with what he calls "many good stories and memorable sayings." In other words, it is quite definitely a book for the general reader.

There seems to be scarcely any country which can make claim to any archæological interest that the author has not at some time or other visited. If one except the field of Baghdad and of the Cyrenaica, no important place in the Near and Middle East has escaped the benefit of the author's comments upon it. Morocco, Algeria, Egypt, the Sudan, Palestine, and India; Asia Minor, Turkey, Greece and the rest of the Balkans, Malta, the Dodecanese, Cyprus, Crete and Malta—he has been in them all. Of his contributions to the archæological knowledge of the world this is not the place to speak: it is perhaps more fitting to recount one or two of his more interesting stories or comments upon movements in the East.

Here, for instance, is his summing-up of Disraeli's policy towards the question of Britain's relations with her Eastern Empire—and it is of very timely value:—

Disraeli had realised that, in so far as being one of the Great Powers of the world is concerned, Great Britain is Great India. The British is an Oriental Empire; apart from our possessions in the Orient, we should be much in the position of Holland. Unfortunately a democracy is wholly unfitted for governing an Oriental Empire, least of all a Western democracy, and the problem Disraeli set himself to solve was how to combine the continuance of an Oriental Empire with the existence of a democratic government at home.

From this extract it is possible to tell that the author's sympathies are not with the "Liberal" school—a fact which is nowhere disguised in this book.

For the benefit of British travellers to the East we cannot forbear quoting this story: it concerns Athens and the great Schliemann, whom our author profoundly admired:—

One afternoon I had gone into the library for a book when I found Pelops there with an American who had come to see the house. The American darted up to me: "Are you Dr. Schliemann?" "No," I said. "Can I see Dr. Schliemann?" "No," I replied; "he is engaged." "I came to Athens yesterday, and am leaving to-morrow, and have seen everything here except the doctor." Then he happened to catch a glimpse of the Acropolis. "I was there this morning, and don't think much of it. Why, we have finer buildings in Washington." I thought it was just as well that the doctor was engaged. But just at that moment Mrs. Schliemann passed the door of the library on her way to her room. The American ran to the door, looked at her skirts as she disappeared, and then turned to me with a smile of satisfaction, and exclaimed: "Well, if I've not seen the doctor, I've seen Mrs. Schliemann."

Our author was, of course, able to study Egypt at very close quarters over a long period of time, and this is how he looked at the situation when Lord Cromer was sent out:—

He had been sent to Egypt with a fixed object: that of establishing the finances of the country for the sake of the foreign bondholders; everything else was to be subordinated to this, and when this was accomplished to the satisfaction of the financial world of Europe, we were to go. Later on, when the annual deficit of the Treasury had been turned into a surplus, justification was sought for our prolonged stay by the invention of a new object: that we were there in order to teach the Egyptians how to govern themselves.

As he elsewhere says, his travels at least have forbidden him to entertain any illusions!

But the book should certainly be read for its own sake. It is by no means well written, but it is profusely enlivened by some good yarns, and contains many shrewd, if not profound, comments on men and affairs. Professor Sayce's has been an unusually full life, and he has met an unusually large number of interesting people in very varied fields of life—upon most of whom he has something fresh to say. Taken in all, it is a rich and "easy" book.

AN ARTIST'S HOLIDAYS.

"MEMORIES OF TRAVEL." By Sir Thomas Graham Jackson, Bart., R.A. (Cambridge: University Press. 10s. 6d. net.)

These slight sketches will not add to their author's already considerable reputation as a skilled and learned traveller, but we are glad that he made up his mind to put them together and present them to the public, if it were only for the sake of the very charming introductory chapter comparing Continental travel in his youth with what meets one nowadays. Sixty years have altogether changed the village and country town of the European Continent (as indeed of our own islands), and the intimate and individual life which the traveller encountered in a French inn is now no longer. An exceedingly charming glimpse of Avallon and Auxerre in 1867 is conjured up in a few lines, and makes us long for "those far-off days" before world-wars and cinemas were.

After some memories of visits to various places in France and Italy in 1875-78 and an account of how Sir Thomas did not see the Dolomites in 1862, we have the delicately tendered story of a trip to Zara, Ragusa, Mostar, Sarajevo, and Spalato in 1893, which is, next to the introductory chapter, the best in the book. Specially are we grateful for the masterly line drawings which illustrate it, as well as for the lovely water-colour sketch of the picturesque bridge at Mostar. Visits to Salonika and Constantinople in 1910 conclude the book, which is beautifully produced by the Cambridge University Press C. S.-W.

THE MACEDONIAN DANGER-SPOT.

It is reported from Belgrade that as soon as a satisfactory settlement has been reached with Italy the Yugoslav Government proposes to take in hand the Macedonian problem. The recent statement of M. Nintchitch, Minister for Foreign Affairs, that for Yugoslavia there could be no "Macedonian question," had reference to the possibility of interference from outside. According to a correspondent of The Times, the Serbs "are resolved to stand no nonsense" about Macedonia. "They do not want to have to fight; but the Macedonian movement can only be put down with the co-operation of the Bulgarian Government. If the Bulgarian Government is unable, or unwilling, to carry out the promises which the late M. Stambolisky made in the Treaty of Nish, the Serbs will unquestionably act themselves sooner or later. There may, perhaps, not be any regular campaign, but Macedonia will become the field of a grim and desperate war of extermination." These are very grave words, for there is no reason to doubt the accuracy of the correspondent's diagnosis of the situation. The Macedonians are a proud and warlike people, as fiercely resolved on independence as Serbians, Greeks, or Bulgarians ever were. Lacking the numbers, but not the spirit, of the nations that have successfully thrown off the Turkish yoke in the Balkans, and handicapped by the effect of these nations' propaganda amongst them in the course of the long struggle against Turkey, the Macedonians have only lately acquired the sense of solidarity, be it racial, national, or merely political. It is probably correct to regard the bulk of them as more akin to Bulgaria than to either of the other two States, and in the past the identity of interests between the Macedonians and the Bulgarians has been emphasised by both parties. The Macedonians may still turn to the Bulgarians for help in the attainment of their aim, but this is no longer absorption into Bulgaria. The only goal they will admit to-day is autonomy, and as they are practical enough to realise that their country is too small to stand alone, they are prepared to accept autonomy under any federal system that offers to incorporate them. Their actual fate, however, as a result of the Allies' victory in the War, has been to be partitioned between Serbia and Greece, while a large portion has sought refuge in Bulgaria.

For Yugoslavia, as we have seen, there is no Macedonian question. A section of Macedonia has, by the Treaty of Neuilly, been incorporated in Serbia; its inhabitants have accordingly become Yugoslavs, and any trouble that the Central Government may have with these people is its own affair, to be settled as it likes, without foreign interference. This line of argument, it will be recalled, held good in the case of the Montenegrins, and, as from the point of view of Belgrade, there is no Montenegrin question to-day, so it is held that within a measurable period there need be no Macedonian question. The flaw in this reasoning is that, unlike Montenegro, which, for all practical purposes is wholly within Yugoslav territory, Macedonia adjoins foreign countries. The Montenegrins resisted incorporation within Serbia, and had only their own mountain fastnesses in which to hold out; the Macedonians resist, and when the pressure becomes too strong for them they can escape across the border to Bulgarian or Greek territory. Their first choice, as may be imagined, falls on the former. It is a grievance with the Yugoslavs that their rebellious subjects not only cross the Bulgarian frontier with impunity, but also return equipped for punitive expeditions. They see in the failure of Bulgaria to put a stop to this anomalous state of affairs an active unfriendliness that cannot be tolerated in a defeated enemy. What M. Nintchitch, therefore, wished to convey by his remarks was that, while the Yugoslavs were prepared to guarantee that there should be no Macedonian question on their side of the frontier, they were entitled to expect Bulgaria to make sure that there was none on her side. Those who have any actual knowledge of the Balkans will know whether this is or is not a reasonable contention. An impartial onlooker would, no doubt, decide in his own mind just how far Bulgaria's plea of helplessness is justified by treaty restrictions on the size of her military forces; but he would note that the number of Macedonians left in Serbia for the Yugoslavs to deal with is small in proportion to the number in Bulgaria, that the attempt of M. Stambolisky to secure Yugoslavia's good will by agreeing to curb the spirit of the Macedonians cost him his life, and that there is no special reason why the picking of chestnuts out of the fire for other folk should be practised more in the Balkans than elsewhere.

On behalf of Yugoslavia it has to be conceded that the Macedonians are not very tractable people. They refuse to acquiesce in that section of the Treaty of Neuilly which particularly concerns them, whereas to the Yugoslavs every clause is sacrosanct. They are the Irish of the Balkans, but are not from an international point of view in the watertight compartment that the British island occupies, nor have they to do with such an easy-going race as the British. If the Yugoslavs could settle their Macedonian question without reference to any other country the subject might not call for the attention of Europe. This, however, they cannot do. It is essential to the settlement which they have in view that Bulgaria should also deal in the same way with her Macedonian population. Bulgaria will not or cannot, and the only way out of the difficulty that occurs at present to Yugoslavia is to compel the Bulgarians to do what she wants. At once the Macedonian question becomes an international problem, and one with which the League of Nations cannot delay to grapple without serious detriment to its reputation. Unfortunately there is a tendency in Yugoslavia to regard any attention given to the Macedonian question in this country as an unfriendly act on the part of an Ally. Far from being this, such attention springs as much from a genuine concern for Yugoslav interests as from any sympathy for Macedonians, who are at best only a name to the British people. Knowledge of the fierce and independent spirit which characterises all the Balkan peoples suggests to the British that the Macedonians are just as capable of making trouble and of keeping up their movement for independence as were the Serbians themselves, the Bulgarians, or the Greeks. Moreover, the dragooning of the Macedonians can be effected only at the cost of Balkan peace, and if the Treaty of Neuilly imposes obligations on the Bulgarians, it imposes equally upon their late enemies the duty expressed in the words "Live and let live." Yugoslav interests, we believe, require a peaceful settlement of the Macedonian problem, not "a war of extermination," and if the League of Nations acts betimes it can secure this, for the honour of Yugoslavia and for her lasting advantage. Delay will allow a conflagration to be started which will not easily be stopped, which may lead to war, and may do more harm to Yugoslavia than the Belgrade authorities of to-day are able to appreciate.

A RESTORATION NAVAL CHAPLAIN IN THE MEDITERRANEAN.

Extracts form the Diary of the Rev. Henry Teonge, Chaplain of H.M.S. Assistance, on active service in the Mediterranean. During December, 1675, H.M.S. Assistance was lying off Alexandretta (Scanderoond).

By H. C. LUKE.

On May 1 Teonge and his companions reached Aleppo, then a place of far greater commercial importance than it is now. It was then one of the principal marts on the trade route between East and West; and England, France, and Holland maintained there factories of their respective Levant companies. During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the English factory of Aleppo was in a highly flourishing condition. Its head performed at the same time the functions of English Consul, and the members lived a collegiate life in the factory building, ruled in civil and commercial matters by the Consul, in spiritual affairs by their chaplain.

May 1.

Where as soon as wee com to the enterance into the towne, Captaine Harman and myselfe were placed in the front, the 2 Janizarys only goeing before us: and all the rest of the gentlemen (of which at least 40 cam to meete us) cam a loofe off behind us, as is the custom there, to signify that wee were straingers. The people boath men and woemen cam out to gaze after us, whilst he and I rodd on together very merily. All the Franks accompany us to the factory; where first the Consull himselfe, and then all the rest of the gentry there present, takes us by the hand, and bids us wellcom. Here the Captaine leaves me, and goes to another English house. Then the Consull, Mr. Gamaliell Nightingall, takes me by the hand, and leads me through a longe hall, in his chamber; to which place cam all the rest of the Franks in particular, that had not done it before, to bid mee welcom to the towne. After a while the Consull takes mee by the hand, and leades me 'thwart a stately roome, which is their chappell, and puts me into a very fayre chamber, and bids mee call it my home, etc.

May 6.

This morning early (as it is the custom all summer longe) at the least 40 of the English, with his worship the Consull, rod out of the cytty about 4 miles to the Greene Platt, a fine vally by a river syde, to recreate them selves. There a princely tent was pitched; and wee had severall pastimes and sports, as duck-hunting, fishing, shooting, hand-ball, krickett, scrofilo; and then a noble dinner brought thither, with greate plenty of all sorts of wines, punch, and lemonads; and at 6 wee returne all home in good order, but soundly tyred and weary.

May 13.

This day I went with 4 more gentlemen to see som of the great houses in the cytty; for it is not permitted to any stranger to com into the castle, except he intend not to com out againe.

The first we went to was a Turk's house, viz., the Mussilem. He himselfe was not at home; but gone the day before to Stambole, alias Constantinople; but wee were kindly entertayned by a servant with tobacco and coffee, and were shewed severall very stately roomes. 'Twas a palace fitt for a King.

The 2d house wee visitted was a Jew's house; whear wee first knocked at the outermost gate, and a servant coming, wee told him our desyre was only to see the house; and he went in to acquaint his Master. Wee would not follow him in, because it was the Jew's sabbaoth day, and about two of the clock. On of the gentlemen of the house cam out himselfe, and led us in, and seemed to take it ill that wee would make any scruple at all of coming in; for, says he, I am much beholden to any stranger that he will take so much paines as to com to see my house. He led us into a spacious roome, in the midst of which was a large fountaine, with 4 cocks flinging up water, and falling into the fountaine; which was a square about 8 yards in compas. And each end of the roome was also a 4 square: and ascended 3 or 4 stepps; the square being spread over with rich carpetts, and velvett and plush longe cushens, richly embroydred with golde, lay closse on to another round about the carpetts. There were 4 gentlemen whoe were all three parts fuddled, and had been merry-makeing with their women, whoe had absented themselves at our approaching (but som of them peeped at us at a dore as wee cam by them). For thus they spend their sabaoth; in the about sunriseing they doe their devotions, and all the day following they spend in frollikeing with their women. They made us extremely welcom with exceeding good wines of severall sorts, and severall sorts of biskott kakes and sweet-meats, such as I never saw before; and shewed us their gardens, and tame pigions, and every thing but their women. This whole streete is all inhabited by Jewes, where wee mett boys and gyrles as fayre and as well complexioned as English.

The third house was also a Turk's house, and a greate man; viz., the Gaw, or Master of the Janizarys. Here wee were also courteously entertayned with tobacco and coffee, and cocolate; and here wee saw som of his breeding mares, which were valued at a high rate; but lookt like very jades. Thence wee cam back to dinner, only just looking into another house as we cam.

The party were now about to rejoin their ships at Alexandretta, but on May 15 received word from the Turkish authorities that they were not to leave the city.

May 16.

A little after ten a clock, our noble Consull, attended with most of the English in towne, went to the Caddee, (who is in the nature of a Ld. Cheife Justice,) to know the cause of our restraint. There was a greate chayre richly gilt, carryd by 2 men, before the Consull all along the streete; and when we cam to his house the chayre was carryd up into the roome, and placed just against the Caddee, who sate like a tayler on his carpetts, with a boy leaneing on a pillow closse by him on his right hand, and 2 more with him like Counsellors. The Caddee had on his head instead of his turbate, a globe, neatly covered with fine linnen, which lay all in very neate pleats, very exactly done, and was neare of the compass of a strike or bushell. Our Consull presently sate downe in his chayre, with his hatt on, and cockt; and haveing dranke a cup of cocolate, and had his beard perfumed (as is their custom, in token of his honour,) he propounds our case very briefly, but by an interpreter. The Caddee by his interpreter gives his answer, and pleades ignorance in the buisnes. But in coms an old Turke, in poore cloathes, stroaking his longe beard a wry, with his nether lipp and chin quivering, holding out his left arme at its full length, with the 3 foremost fingers stretched out, and his thumb and little finger cluncht together in the middle of his hand; and pulling one of the little buttons that were on the bosum of his delaman, with the fore-finger and the thumb of his right hand, (all of which are signs of verity of speech;) and alleages that a Maltee cursare had taken a syke, which was laden with his goods, and that the English were accessary to it, and had bought many of his goods; and he proferd to make oath of this, though it was a very lye. After a little examination, his oath would not be taken; and the Caddee told us that wee might goe when wee pleased. Notwithstanding all this, at on a clock a messenger was sent to deny Captaine Harman's passage.

May 19.

This morning our Consull being allmost impatient, knowing that our shipps were ready to sayle for England, being accompanyed with a greate traine of brave English men, and also som Dutch and French, went bouldly to theire Seraglio, a very gallant place; where wee find the Caddee, the Meane, the Mussilem, and the Master of the Janizarys (the 4 governors of the cytty) all together. After the ceremonys before specifyd were over, our Consull began with greate courage to charge them with breach of articles, and to demand satisfaction for our false imprisonment; and told them that if he could not be heard there, he would goe with lights to Stambole, and make the Greate Turke acquainted with the buisnes. This dispute grew higher and higher for at leaste halfe an hower; the old Turke aggravating what he had alleged, with a greate deale of earnestnes and confidence; I might say, impudence. In the heate of all this discourse cam in a packett from Stamboule to our Consull, which he commaunded to be opened before them all; for, says hee, there may be in it somthing may concerne our busines: and so it proved; for there was an order or expresse to the Mussellem from the Grand Seniour, to confirm and establish all the commands and priviledges that were formerly made concerning the English. At the sight of which, the Turks lookt very dijectedly on upon the other, and presently gave us all our liberty without paying so much as an asper: the Musellem speakeing these words in their language, "The order is good, and must be observed by my head;" makeing all of them a low bow to us all.

So back wee returne with greate tryumph and rejoycing; and all provide for our jurny next morning. But such a parting of friends did I never see. The kind treate, and loath to depart, ended at my chamber; for the Consull went to each of their chambers particularly to bid them farewell, and mine was the last he visitted, being the next to his owne, where he gave me 2 chekeens (chequins).

On May 20 Teonge and his companions, accompanied by several gentlemen of the factory, whom he called "Alopeenes," leave Aleppo, and reach Alexandretta two days later.

May 29.

The Byrth Day and Restoration Day of our soveraine King Charles II. I preacht a sermon: text Psal. cxviii. 24. After dinner our Captaine began the King's health, and fyred 11 guns; the Providence 9; the Martin 7: the Alopeenes give us wines galloore. And much about sunn setting wee see som part of the iland of Cyprus.

June 5.

I goe on shoare to buy wine to carry (God willing) into England; and I dined at our Consull's at Larneca.

During June and July the Assistance is much becalmed, not making Malta until July 23.

July 25.

At 10 this morning wee are under sayle and, God willing, for fayre England. Boone voyagio! Our ship is very leaky.

August 10.

Wee are closse under Monte Christo, a high rock in the sea; and suddenly wee have Illbay or Lillbow on our starboard syde, and have another flatt iland on our larboard, called Planosa. This day our noble Alopeenes did make grande festo for all the gentlemen in our squadron, where wee had a noble Venetian belonging to the Thomas and Francis, whoe brought with him from Smyrna a Greeke lady, at a vast charge to him; and made us happy with her company at our ship at dinner. Shee was wondrous rich in habits, and counted the beauty of the Levant, but I have seene far handsomer in England amonge our milk mayds. Tis calme all this night.

Not so, however, during the rest of the voyage. After rounding Gibraltar the luckless Assistance runs into dirty weather, and only with difficulty reaches England.

September 14.

Stormy weather, and raine; a sad tempestuous night. A dangerous leaky shipp, and as bad, or worse, to-day.

Sunday, September 17.

About 4 in the morning the seas groe far more outragious, and breake clearly over our quarter deck; drive our hen-cubbs (coops) overboard; and washed on of our seamen cleane off the crotchett-yard. A second sea cam, and threw downe all our boomes; brake boath pinnace, and longe boate, on the decks. A third cam, and flung our anchor off the ship syd, flung the bell out of his place, brake off the carving, and pulld 2 planks a sunder in the midst of the ship, betweene decks, and just against the pump. Our forecastle was broake all downe longe before. Now the men are all dishartened, and expect nothing but the losse of ship and life. Our larboard gunnhill all broake up, a whole planke almost out betweene decks; men swimming about in the wast of the ship; and greate seas often breaking over us. I never saw such a Sunday, and I hope shall never forget to give God thanks for this day's deliverance; for it was a miracle that ever wee escaped. At last our Captaine and the rest, consulting, made a shift to put up a small fore-sayle, and put the ship before the wind. Many greate seas breake over us all this night, and we have little hopes of any safety yet.

September 18.

As bad still, and wee are glad wee can put our ship before the wind to com to any port; but wee strive for Lysbon in Portugall. God send us safe in any port! for our ship is miserably shaken, and our men all tyred off their leggs and much dishartened.

October 26.

I went a shoare to Famouth: and cam not away till Saturday 28. Here wee spent all my Turkish gold, viz. 4 good chekeens.

October 30.

A fayre day, but very cold.

October 31.

And so to day. On Arrowsmyth, for lying a shoare without leave, was ducked at the yard arms.

November 17.

Friday, the 17th of November, wee are payd off at Dedford; where wee leave the rottenest frigot that ever cam to England.

(Concluded.)

THE ROYAL EGYPTIAN LEGATION.

A permanent Diplomatic Mission has been established in London by King Fuad of Egypt; it is officially styled the Royal Egyptian Legation, but although it is a Legation, its head, H.E. Aziz Azzet Pasha, is accredited to the Court of Great Britain, in virtue of the fact that his post is the creation of a monarch, not of a Government. The Minister Plenipotentiary himself has had a distinguished career in Egypt, but is also well known in this country. He studied at the University of Cambridge, and at Woolwich, and having returned to Egypt, was sent, as A.D.C. to the Khedive Tewfik, on missions to England, where he was presented to Queen Victoria, King Edward, and to King George. He is fifty-four years of age, and is married to a niece of King Fuad.

Mahmoud Sabet Bey, First Secretary to the Legation, was also educated at the University of Cambridge. In 1914 he was appointed to be Master of Ceremonies to the Egyptian Court under the late Sultan Hussein, and subsequently became Third and Second Chamberlain to King Fuad.

The Second Secretary, Mohamed Kamel Moursi Bey, was educated in Cairo. He has devoted himself principally to the study of law. In 1914 he was made a Doctor in Law, and later became Deputy Public Prosecutor.

Abdel Rahman Fikri, Third Secretary, was educated in Egypt and in England. At the London School of Economics and Political Science he took an Honours degree in Science in 1917, and was afterwards admitted to the Middle Temple.

It is stated that Mohamed Fahmy Hussein will fill the office of Counsellor to the Legation. He has specialised chiefly in law, and has acted as Adviser to the Ministries of Education and Agriculture.

Headway, the organ of the League of Nations Union, states that General Ismet Pasha, the Turkish Bash Vekil, has asked the Permanent Court of International Justice to nominate a number of legal advisers, of nationalities neutral during the War, to assist in the administration of justice in Turkey. This procedure is provided for in the Treaty of Lausanne.

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London, W.C.,
Tuesday Morning.

Trade Under Difficulties.

It cannot be said of 1924—a year which promises to be historic for its Test Matches, the Olympic Games, and last, but not least, the British Empire Exhibition—that it has commenced uneventfully. It has opened much too forcefully for most people, certainly for the business and commercial community. A Labour Government, with all the uncertainties that attach to a novel experiment, would, it appeared, be the first development; but a railway strike, in racing parlance, has beaten it by a short head, and since yesterday morning those whose business activities are, unhappily for them, laid in London have been experiencing the discomfort inseparable from the failure of the railways to function normally. As to whether the strike will be long or short there is no indication at the time of writing, but it seems clear to me that this latest attempt on the part of Labour to make capital out of the fact that in an ultra-developed State like Great Britain the disturbance of utility services has an inordinate effect, is likely to have consequences other than those responsible for the strike have contemplated. It is probable that the main result of the strike will be that an enormous impetus will be given to motor transport, to the lasting detriment of the railways. Conditions in this country, unfortunately, are not suitable for the development of the motor industry on the American scale, but, all the same, there is wide scope for progress in this direction, and no doubt the tendency henceforward will be to extend the use of the motor, which will be good for the industry and bad for the railways.

The Outlook.

One consequence of the strike has been to increase the apprehension felt in the business world in regard to the advent of a Labour Government, for it is not unnaturally argued that such extreme irresponsibility on the part of a section of Labour on the eve of the party's first accession to power augurs ill for the outlook. Of course, it is perfectly true that with the present strength of the parties in the House it is impossible for the Labour Government to pursue such items of its policy as a capital levy, but that fact of itself cannot restore the confidence that vanished when the result of the General Election was known. Stability is the first essential for trade at the present time, and it is perfectly obvious that the present House of Commons holds out no prospect of anything of the kind. Besides, there is a good deal that a Labour Government can do in the present conditions that would be undesirable, and it is not surprising in the circumstances that there should be a certain amount of nervousness. The tragedy of the position is that the want of confidence means restricted trade activities, for business men cannot be persuaded to launch out into new enterprises if they cannot tell with reasonable certainty the conditions with which they will be confronted in a few months. The Labour Party has only itself to thank for this situation, and Mr. Ramsay MacDonald will deserve well of the country if during his tenure of office he can dissipate the anxieties raised by the speeches of the extremists among his followers.

Empire Cotton Growing.

I have just received the first issue of the Empire Cotton Growing Review, a quarterly journal issued by the Empire Cotton Growing Corporation, and published by Messrs. A. and C. Black. It goes without saying that the more publicity given to matters connected with cotton growing within the Empire the better, and the Corporation is to be congratulated on its undertaking. In an introductory article the scope and purposes of the journal are explained. It is proposed to publish particulars of the Corporation's activities, and also information regarding cotton growing problems throughout the Empire. The review is intended thus to act as a clearing house of intelligence collected from various Dominions and Colonies, keeping directors of agriculture and others engaged in cotton growing in touch with developments and experiments elsewhere, and with statistics as to the cotton crops of the world.

Turkey and Foreign Salvage Companies.

It would appear that further consideration has convinced the Angora authorities of the unwisdom of the course that they have pursued with regard to foreign shipping, for it is now reported that foreign salvage companies have been advised "unofficially" that no exception will be taken to their carrying out operations in Turkish waters. As pointed out in an article in these columns last week, the only effect of the persistence in the prohibition on the work of foreign salvage companies would have been that Turkish overseas trade would have suffered. It may be hoped that this change of front indicates an orientation of policy on the part of Angora.

COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY.

(Reports from Our Own Correspondents.)

ROUMANIA.

Bucharest, January 12.

Increased Duties on Textiles?

The Roumanian textile manufacturers have presented a memorandum to M. Tancred Constantinescu, the Minister for Commerce, asking for an increase in the duties on foreign textiles. The Committee formed for the protection of home manufactures will deal with the question at its next meeting, at which a concrete proposal is to be put forward by the textile manufacturers. If, as is to be anticipated, M. Constantinescu accepts the proposal it will then be sent to the Chief Customs Office for application. In view of the fact that there are many factories in the old Kingdom, as well as in Transylvania, manufacturing cheap textiles, it is a matter of vital importance that protection should be afforded against the influx of Czecho-Slovakian goods. The increase in import duties will only affect the classes of textiles manufactured locally, so that English exporters of fine woollens will not suffer.

Foreign Workmen in Roumania.

The position of foreign workmen seeking employment in Roumania has hitherto been very uncertain. The co-operation of the Inspectors of Labour with the magistrates in the expulsion of foreign foremen has resulted in many mistakes being made, though it must be admitted that the magistrates have displayed extreme prudence in the business. With a view to regularising the position the Inspector of Labour at Cluj has now proposed to the Ministry of Industry that the issue of permits to settle in Roumania should devolve on the inspectors. Foreign foremen desiring to stay longer in the country would have to certify that they really do perform expert work, and, in addition, they would have to furnish a certificate from an employment bureau in the district of the inspector that there are no native expert workmen available, when a permit would be issued to remain. The proposal has been approved by the Ministry of Industries and by the Ministry of Labour.

MOTOR TRANSPORT IN GREECE.

Although Greece is relatively an unimportant market for automotive products, its activity is slowly increasing, despite the handicap of political and economic uncertainties (says an American Consular report). In the first eight months of 1923, 240 cars were imported, 105 of which entered the country during July and August. Half of the total importation during these two months, or 52 cars, came from the United States. More recently the demand has slowed up materially, and the last quarter of the year has been a dull season. Estimates place the number of cars now in operation in Greece at somewhat less than 4,000, of which approximately one-fourth are said to be of an inexpensive American make.

The condition of Greek roads in general is poor and unfavourable to motor travel. Motor transportation is little developed, except in the cities of Athens and Piræus and their suburbs and to a lesser extent in Salonika and Patras; the roads in the provinces and outlying districts render motoring highly impracticable.

Marine engines and motor-boats have never been introduced on a large scale in Greece, and under the existing difficult exchange conditions and uncertain internal situation, local agents regard the trade as practically dormant. During the war this branch of the local market was largely contolled by Sweden, but in 1919 and 1920 the domination was wrested from it by American and German firms, the latter taking the lead. At present the Germans are reported to be out of the market, so that competition is practically non-existent. Most of the marine engines in use in Greece are of the internal-combustion type, using crude oil as fuel.

ENGINEERING TOPICS.

New Vickers Orders.

Messrs. Vickers, Limited, of Barrow-in-Furness, have recently received an order for Japanese owners for two marine heavy oil engines of 600 b.h.p., to be repeats of the engine recently delivered to the order of their associates, Messrs. Mitsubishi Shoji Kaisha, Ltd., Cory Buildings, 117, Fenchurch Street, London, E.C.3. These engines are of the four-stroke cycle crosshead type, with six cylinders 18¼ in. diameter by 27 in. stroke, and easily develop the required power at 150 r.p.m.

Tendency of Marine Motor Design.

It is always instructive to study the interplay of forces actuating the designers of engines intended respectively for use on land, at sea, and in the air. The conditions governing their use in the different circumstances are bound to produce divergent features, and thus when any one particular feature becomes more or less standardised on all three types of machines it may be reasonably concluded that the particular feature has a root value forming, so to speak, the quintessence of the design in that particular form of prime mover. The exhibitions held in London in 1923 have permitted of very close examination and comparison in the various classes of engines, with the result that if one can pick out one feature more than another which points the way to tendency in design for 1924 it is the position of the valves. There is no doubt that the overhead valve engine has continued to make very steady headway. In car engines the most notable recruit to this form of construction is the Rolls-Royce Motor Company, whose latest engine is fitted with overhead valves. Among the engines designed entirely for marine work the Ailsa Craig stands out as the strongest adherent of overhead valves, which they are using on all sizes of their engines, from 6 h.p. upwards. In aircraft engines the Napier Lion is the well-known exponent of this form of construction. It will thus be seen that leading firms have definitely adopted overhead valves, and this certainly gives a strong pointer as to the tendency of design. The monobloc form of construction is steadily gaining favour, and in one notable example has been extended to a six-cylinder model, which is tending to become more and more popular for the same reasons which have led to the rapid development of this type in luxury cars—i.e., exceptionally quiet and smooth running.

REMOVAL OF WELL-KNOWN ADVERTISING AGENCY.

On January 28 the well-known advertising agency, G. Street and Co., Ltd., of 30, Cornhill, will find itself installed in new and more commodious premises at 6, Gracechurch Street, E.C. For nearly eighty years Streets have been established at 30, Cornhill, the original founders, at a very early date in the firm's history, having taken a few rooms at No. 30. Gradually extending connection demanded more space until all the upper floors at this address were occupied. At 6, Gracechurch Street, five floors will be occupied. The building is of handsome external appearance, and contains ample floor space, and will make an adequate home for Streets, who, by the way, are in their ninety-third year of existence. The building is situated at the Cornhill end of Gracechurch Street, next to the Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, while an entrance with service lift is situated in Corbet Court.

Vickers, Ltd., hydro-electric department, have received an order for a 25,000 h.p. water turbine, which they will instal at Calumet Island, on the Ottawa River, in Canada. The river falls 60 ft. at this point, and a power station is now under construction which will eventually house three units such as the above. This is in all respects the largest single runner Francis water turbine which has been built in England.

THE BULLION MARKET IN 1923.

Messrs. Samuel Montagu and Co.'s Review.

Some interesting comments on the general situation are made by Messrs. Samuel Montagu and Co. in their annual bullion review in dealing with the position with regard to gold. They say:—

In our annual letter for 1919, we referred to the fact that gold had become a mere commodity. It is so still. Statistics show that India and the United States of America absorb between them almost all the world's output of this metal. In neither country is the gold put into circulation as currency. In the former it is regarded as a precious metal bearing a ratio towards rupees—the silver coins of that Empire—differing from that set up by the Imperial Government of the country by the official calculation of 10 rupees to the sovereign. In the latter, it is interned in the Reserve of the Federal Banks, and its accumulation watched with anxious care, let it should operate to the prejudice of prices and trade. In other words, the United States is suffering to some extent from the trouble that afflicted King Midas.

The cure for this unnatural use of gold is renewed activity in trade between the nations. When this is resumed gold will not form one of the chief imports of the two countries which we have mentioned, and—provided militarism is laid aside for peaceful industry—other European nations will be able to build up reserves of gold and rehabilitate their currencies. To suggest the use of gold in a currency system without trade is like pushing artillery into action without adequate support.

The distressing amount of unemployment in this country is of pressing moment. A resort to a policy of inflation, however—in other words, a deliberate loosening of the link between the currency and the gold standard—can give no prospect of permanent improvement in the situation. Nay more, it might prove, as in the case of Germany, a step upon a glissade leading towards disaster irreparable, as far as the credit of our State is concerned. A definite distinction exists between a policy of arresting deflation of the currency and one of inflation. No wise man would attempt to set his financial affairs in order by a sudden and excessive reduction in expenditure liable to jeopardise the due discharge of his business duties, or the health of his dependents. Hence it is worthy of consideration whether the sound policy of deflation ought not to be temporarily suspended in the hope that a revival of world trade may render the operation more opportune.

Return to a Gold Standard.

For the sake of national credit, the sooner normality of the currency is gained, so much the better, and it is well that the national will to that end has now been abundantly demonstrated to the world. Whilst, however, so many workers fail to find employment, a temporary suspension of the repayment of internal debt, and the application of part of the State's income, hitherto used therefore, to remunerative schemes of labour, seems sound in principle. In the desire to alleviate the present distress every man of goodwill is at one. The advisability of returning to an effective gold standard is far from academic. It has very practical interest to all dwellers in the United Kingdom, particularly to the people of London who enjoy peculiar benefits from international trade. Nor are the great shipping companies which radiate from these shores unconcerned with the question of inflation or deflation, for the size of their cargoes depends very largely upon the stability of the British pound as a medium of exchange in foreign markets.

A traveller crossing the metropolis and its suburbs, as he contemplates the interminable villas, merging into streets, and condensing into tightly packed houses, until the City proper is reached, with its mass of public offices, and then reverses the panorama until he has covered a total expanse of fifteen or twenty miles, must often wonder whence the mass of population obtains means of support. As yet there seems no check to the continual increase in numbers and of the residential area.

It is almost impossible to do more than guess the proportion of these people who derive a livelihood from industries that could prosper without the assistance of national imports and exports—that is to say, without international trade. It is also difficult to judge how many of these folk could remain in London if the currency became a variable commodity without fixed relation to the gold standard. The great bulk of the population of London gains a living from services rendered to the world at large, for London acts as its banker, insurance and commission agent; and landlords, shopkeepers, tradesmen, and other servants of the community, as well as a very large proportion of those engaged in clerical work, would rue bitterly any interference with their currency system that would threaten the position of London as the world's financial centre.

A concrete instance of the close relation between the currency and the prosperity of this country recently occurred. When some uneasiness was created in October last by an ill-expressed semi-official statement, the representative of a Continental country sought information whether a policy of inflation was likely to be adopted, for, had such an event been impending, the cash balance held by that country here would have been withdrawn, and important orders for some of the staple manufactures of this country would have been held over in the hope of obtaining lower prices in foreign currency when the pound depreciated abroad as a consequence of such a policy. This lack of confidence would certainly not have been confined to one country alone. The foregoing remarks must not be construed into an argument that the gold standard is an ideal basis for currency. It can, however, amid the shifting quicksands of these troublous days, act as a rock where some foothold can be found, and, in the interests of the Empire, as well as that of the people of this country, it were well if, founded upon it, a beacon light shone from Great Britain for the encouragement as well as the warning of nations.

World Confidence in Great Britain.

There can be no more fallacious idea with regard to this vital question than to imagine that our closely populated country could flourish upon a managed currency. It is ill enough for countries who depend little upon the outside world to play a game that involves nothing less than a loading of the dice. For Great Britain it would be suicidal. The world looks to us because it has deemed us worthy of trust. It places its funds here, enabling us to lend cheaply to other nations and obtain interest and goods in payment for our loans; it sends its goods here as a distributing market, whence our shipping conveys them to the far corners of the earth. It has been accustomed to regard British banks as safe media for converting currencies, because the worth of the currency unit of Great Britain has ever been maintained with jealous care. The only possible policy by which the small islands that compose Great Britain can continue to maintain with comfort a population of 45,000,000 souls is an early return to an effective gold standard. Hardly less dangerous to the well-being of the community is the suggestion that prices should be stabilised or regulated by concerted action on the part of the banks with regard to the volume of credit under their control. Action of this character, based as it could only be on a partial knowledge of the actual facts, is tantamount to an arbitrary manipulation of the currency, and, as for its action upon foreign exchanges, is far inferior to that of an effective gold standard holding the scales as they rise or fall in accordance with demand and supply.

We have referred in a previous annual letter to the presence of gold in sea water. It is reported that the quantity has been recently reduced from one grain to under one-thousandth part of a grain per ton of sea water. We have been informed that experts in England and in America have shown that one metal can be changed into another at certain periods by radio activity, such as when there are sun spots. At such a time there is immense radio action upon the earth, and this is said to be the only possible explanation of the disappearance of so large a proportion of the gold in sea water. Hence, though gold has been actually recovered from sea water at a considerable cost, its extraction is now still less a paying commercial proposition.

Silver.

On January 1 the price for cash and two months' delivery were respectively 31½d. and 30⅝d. Thus the year commenced with a premium for prompt delivery, a feature continued uninterruptedly throughout the whole year. On no occasion were the prices identical or their relative positions reversed. This is significant. Inasmuch as no demand of any import-

SPECIAL MARKET REPORT.

NABLUS, December 15.

The grain market is quiet. Heavy rain has fallen, relieving a situation which was regarded as alarming.

JAFFA, December 22.

Considerable rain fell during the week. Owing to the stormy weather, no oranges have been shipped. The latest prices obtained in the United Kingdom range from 10s. to 11s. per case.

HAIFA, December 22.

The grain market is still inactive. Offers and inquiries are numerous, but the second more than the first, so that the firmness of prices is maintained.

NICOSIA, December 22.

We have fortunately had good rains, so that the prospects of the crop are brighter. The local markets are extremely quiet.

CZECHO-SLOVAK MARKET FOR MOTORS.

Approximately 12,000 motor vehicles, including motor-cycles, are registered in the Republic of Czecho-Slovakia, and the annual purchases of automobiles total about 1,000 (says the American Consul at Prague, Mr. C. S. Winans, in a recent report). The local industry is in an unfavourable condition at present because of high prices of material, heavy Government taxes, and the scarcity and high cost of labour. Importation of foreign cars is controlled by a permit system. The lightweight limousine with an economical engine is the type most preferred, although open cars also are popular. Motor vehicle imports into Czecho-Slovakia during the first seven months of 1923 amounted to 1,081 motor-cycles and 543 tons of automobiles and motor trucks. The exports from Czecho-Slovakia aggregated only 67 tons, and consisted chiefly of passenger cars to Austria and Hungary. Of the 1,081 motor-cycles entering the country, 584 were from Germany, 245 from the United States, and 252 from other countries.

OPENING FOR FOUNTAIN PENS.

There is a fair market at present for fountain pens in Czecho-Slovakia (says an American Consular report). At the present time the largest demand is in Prague and the industrial centres of the country. Here they are sold exclusively by stationery stores, where each dealer usually carries a number of different makes, sometimes as high as six or more. Dealers generally secure their stocks either direct from the factory or from some distributor outside the country, except where the manufacturer has a representative in Prague, this being true of two or three of the most popular makes. The most popular pens in Czecho-Slovakia are two of American make, the "Onoto" of British origin, and a number of German pens.

The progress reports of Phœnix Oil and Transport Co., Ltd., and Allied Companies for December show that the total crude oil production for the month was 7,450 tons, and the throughput of the refineries 7,665 tons.

ance arose for coinage, and trade demand was far from brisk, it indicated the strong and almost continuous demand which came from India and China—sometimes a real absorption, at other times a temporary accumulation by speculators in one of these countries, sometimes in both. The consumption of the Far East was extremely large—considerably in excess of pre-war days. This was only to be expected, for, as Western trade and coinage demand did not increase, there was really nowhere else than the distant Orient where silver could go. Hence details of silver movements have been somewhat monotonous. If silver were shipped, it did not always reach its original consignee, for very often—whether shipped from London, America, or elsewhere—it was diverted to India or to China at some part of its journey, just according to the conditions obtaining at the moment.

The size of the imports of silver into India and China has been very remarkable, though, of course, these countries are the only outlet for surplus supplies of the metal. The absorption of silver by China has been assisted in recent years by greater mintage of dollars by native mints; obviously, ingots of 56 oz. weight—such as sycee—are very cumbersome compared with coin. Coinage by European mints has been only on a small scale, but there are some indications of a revival. Trade use in Western countries has been far from good. Supplies have been swollen by freshly demonetised metal, yet without much set-back in prices, the Orient having drawn these unusually large consignments from Europe and America. Although there have been no purchases for coinage in India for some years, the amount absorbed in that country has been about double the pre-war average, as also has been that imported into China.

The amount of silver coin in the Indian Currency Reserves continues to be very substantial. The note issue has expanded freely. The ratio of the issue to the silver reserves at the beginning of the year was 49.6 per cent., and at the end of the year 47.2 per cent. The readiness with which the people of India make use of paper currency betrays their confidence in the system arranged for their convenience. The new arrangement for the seasonal creation of notes against selected commercial bills has worked very well. The Indian Government has simplified currency problems lately by arranging for the amalgamation of the Presidency Banks into one central institution—the Imperial Bank of India—and by placing its branches in all the chief trading centres of the Indian Empire. The Imperial Bank of India opened fifty-nine branches in the course of 2½ years, out of a stipulated number of 100 to be started within five years. Such a development cannot fail to discourage the hoarding of silver coins, and to encourage the use of notes. It must also, by the facilities offered at the branches, and by the opportunity given for safe storage and judicious investment, stimulate the thrift of the people.

Investment v. Hoarding.

The advisability of directing the savings of the agricultural classes into safe channels of investment is plain now that the manufactures of India are becoming very important, for there exists a profitable investment for them in native mills and other local industries, provided they are well managed: this is far better than the old custom of hoarding rupees underground. The practice of investment, however, is not learnt in a short time—it is an acquired habit—and even in the Western countries is often practised with a lamentable lack of judgment. Nevertheless, the acquisition of assets that fructify is sound in principle. There is little doubt that Indian industrial investments are appealing to Western investors also, and that the heavy bullion movements to India are not unconnected with this fact. India's cotton yield is creating records, and is ousting that of America from the world's markets. Of this crop, about two-thirds has been shipped to Japan and China, where the buying has more than doubled in two years. India has increased her area of wheat by 1,270,000 acres. Her sugar crop is larger and she is shipping tea more freely. Other products, such as skins and jute, find a very profitable market in the United States and elsewhere.

The price of silver has moved to a remarkable degree in correspondence with the U.S. exchange. This is shown by comparing it with that of gold, which as a rule has followed that exchange. February was the month showing the lowest average prices of silver and gold, whilst December recorded the highest average of both metals. The lowest price of silver on February 8 was coincident with a quotation of 88s. 4d. for gold—only 11d. above the lowest—whilst when silver was quoted 33⅝d. on November 19 (1-16d. below the record price of the year), gold was fixed at 96s. 11d., actually the record for the year. Presumably, whilst the U.S. production was being acquired under the Pittman Act, silver interests in the United States were able to keep the U.S. dollar quotation for foreign-produced silver fairly stable by selling sparingly on a declining and freely on a rising market.

A fair estimate of the world's stocks at the end of 1923 is as follows (in ounces):—London, 1,000,000; Shanghai (including dollars), 46,000,000; India, 7,000,000; on the sea (from and to London and from San Francisco), 16,000,000; total, 70,000,000.

The future of silver is obscure. The substantial accession to available supplies, caused by the U.S. output again coming into the market, would seem to suggest easier prices, but this might possibly be partially or wholly set off by reduced offerings of demonetised metal and by a tendency on the part of the smaller European States to mint silver subsidiary coins in order to create confidence in their monetary systems. This step has taken place in some countries already, but there is not yet any indication that the more powerful States in the West and South will, in the near future, go to such an expense so long as their note issues readily circulate within their territory. Nor would it seem probable that any return of the quality of British silver coins to 925/1000 from 500/1000 fine is likely whilst economy is of pressing moment in the interests of State finance.

Trade Conditions Altered.

The extremely large silver shipments to India and China during recent years, and the wonderful way in which they have been absorbed, are sufficient to deter anyone from assuming too readily the rôle of a pessimist. Channels of trade have been deflected so radically by the new powerful currents created by the Great War, and so deadly a blow has been dealt in the interior of China to paper currency by the collapse of the rouble note, that it is not yet possible to judge by pre-war standards of the course which Eastern silver markets are likely to follow. It is, also, too early to fathom to what extent, if any, the agitation in U.S. mining circles is to materialise. Moreover, the political situation is not sufficiently defined for a forecast to be made as to the course of the American exchange. This has dominated the price of silver throughout the year, for the least depreciation of the pound sterling coincided almost with the lowest quotation and the greatest depreciation very nearly with the highest quotation of silver. One element which may have to be reckoned with is a possible increase in the visible stocks of silver in India and China, the reinforcement of which from the West carried the price of silver during the last month to the highest point in the year. These consignment have seemed enough to tax the energies of even their strong digestive powers.

The Greek Moratorium Law has been further extended to February 29.

A Marine and Small Craft Exhibition is to be held at the Royal Agricultural Hall from March 15 to 22.

It is reported that a gusher has been brought in on the property of the Phœnix Oil and Transport Company.

The traffic receipts of the Egyptian Delta Light Railways for the eleven days ended December 31 amounted to £E13,595, making the total from April 1 £E244,791.

The output of Dacia Romano Petroleum for December was 475 tons. The decrease was due to the sanding-up of Moreni well No. 2, which is now being cleaned out.

The Department of Overseas Trade has received through the Commercial Secretary at Constantinople a request from a Turkish manufacturer of boots and shoes for prices, terms, etc., of leather from United Kingdom firms.

A Reuter message from Allahabad states that the correspondent of the Pioneer at Teheran telegraphs that Mr. Bennett, representing an important American railway group, has arrived there with the intention, it is believed, of negotiating with the Government for railway and mining concessions in Persia similar to those granted to Americans in Turkey.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Market Quiet and Variable.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended January 16 :—

Egyptian Spot.—The past week has been a very quiet one, and the tendency of prices has been towards a lower level until to-day, when, in response to a change of sentiment in the American markets, due to larger consumption figures than had been anticipated, the Liverpool markets showed a better tone, and prices were advanced 25 points all round. Very little buying enthusiasm has been witnessed, spinners as a whole being quite satisfied to purchase in hand-to-mouth quantities pending a more settled state of affairs in the political world, and the only feature worth remarking on is a still further hardening in the prices of the better grades of Sakellaridis. A tendency has also been shown by certain holders of Upper cotton to keep their prices well up, but, as we mentioned last week, the Upper market is inclined to be erratic at present, and prices continue to be regular.

The inquiry for Sakellaridis has covered a wide field, roughly, from 150 "off" to 175 "on" contracts. A good style of Fully Good Fair Sakel can be purchased here to-day at about 23.00d. Inferior Sakel has been pushed for sale, and holders are willing to meet would-be purchasers. The inquiry for Low cottons at anything from 10d. up to 17d. per lb. has latterly shown some increase. Brown cotton has been asked for on several occasions at about 20d. to 21d. per lb., but actual business has been difficult to trace. White cotton has been neglected. Rather an improved demand for Sudan cotton (Sakel variety) has been observed, but, so far, little business has actually resulted.

C.i.f. business has ruled quiet, but rumours from Manchester early in the week rather pointed to the fact that more business was doing at that end, in certain quarters at all events. Indeed, in view of the optimistic trade reports which have recently emanated from Manchester, it is rather surprising that more c.i.f. business has not transpired all round. Apparently, both India and China have been furnishing important inquiries for goods. Price adjustment, as must always be the case, continues to be the stumbling-block, but it is probable that any favourable development in home politics (possible unfavourable developments would appear to have been largely discounted) might induce buying by our foreign customers on a large scale. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending 11th inst. were returned as 14,302 bales. Estimated sales, 1,500 bales Egyptian and 160 bales Sudan. Quotations of Upper and Brown are reduced 65 points, those of Sakellaridis are 50 points lower, with the exception of Fine and Extra Fine, which are only 15 points lower. Fully Good Fair Sakellaridis to-day 23.10d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

The Outlook.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended January 19 states :—

Market conditions during the past week can be described as neither good nor bad. The turnover has certainly been unequal to that of the previous week, but the difference of opinion between buyers and sellers on the subject of price shows less disparity than might have been expected. This encourages the view that goods are really wanted, and that, given some degree of steadiness in the price of raw cotton, actual business will follow in due course.

Yarn.—The turnover in this section shows an increase, but still leaves much to be desired. An encouraging feature is the somewhat large demand for India, and in some cases fairly large contracts are said to have been booked. Published figures regarding exports of yarn during 1923 show that 145,019,500 lb. were exported, as against 201,593,000 lb. in 1922, the relative values being £21,011,911 in 1923, as against £26,474,623 in 1922.

Cloth.—Inquiry has again been on a fairly large scale, but buyers abroad still show reluctance to respond to the increased cost of production. Inquiry from India has been good, but the prices offered have not been sufficient to enable any large volume of business to be transacted. It is some encouragement, however, to hear this indication that goods are needed. Bookings for the Near East and South America have been unimportant, but traders report better results for the Continent and the Colonies. Home trade buyers, whilst well in evidence, are said to be buying rather sparingly. Exports of piece goods during 1923 totalled 4,141,303,710 sq. yards, as against 4,183,729,100 sq. yards in 1922, the relative values being £138,354,135 in 1923 as against £142,436,751 in 1922. The average price of the cloth exported last year was 7.86d. per sq. yard, against 8.17d. in 1922. It is interesting to note that these figures compare with 3.22d. in 1913.

Raw Cotton.—Prices have been easier during the past week, mainly due to the less favourable advices from the United States concerning the amount of raw cotton being consumed there and the anticipation that the acreage under cultivation next year will show a considerable increase. Fluctuations have been fairly wide, a condition of things to which the market is getting accustomed, the principal changes being a decline of 23 points last Saturday, a rise of 36 points on Wednesday, a fall of 38 points on Thursday, and a fall of 21 points on Friday. Demand for all American descriptions has been quiet, and the same may be said of Egyptian varieties. Closing prices yesterday were as follows :—American Fully Middling 19.33d., Egyptian Fully Good Fair 22.90d.

SMYRNA FRUIT REPORT.

Messrs. C. J. Giraud and Co. report as follows under date January 5 :—The market is strong, prices showing a marked advance over last week's level. Stocks are getting into so narrow a compass that business is necessarily restricted. Indications point to the remainder of supplies being worked off at gradually advancing rates over the very near future.

COMPANY NOTES AND REPORTS.

Bengal and North-Western Railway.

The report of the Bengal and North Western Railway Company for the year ended September 30, states that the net earnings amounted to Rs.1,68,53,685, as against Rs.1,68,36,341. The company's share is Rs.98,67,000, as against Rs.98,36,380 in 1922. The rate of exchange during the period was slightly above 1s. 4d., the book rate, and adding the actual gain in remittances (£4,850), the net earnings for the year are £662,650, as against £646,579 in 1922. An interim dividend of 4 per cent., plus a bonus of 1 per cent. on the ordinary stock, was paid in July. After bringing forward £126,144, providing for corporation and income-taxes, interest on debenture and preference stocks, interim dividend, and bonus, and making other provisions, there is £315,532. A final dividend is recommended of 4 per cent., plus a bonus of 2 per cent., on the ordinary stock, less tax at 2s. 5d. in the £, absorbing £158,250, leaving £157,282 to be carried forward.

LONDON PRODUCE REPORT.

Sugar Harder.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday Morning.

Sugar.—Home refined has been in good request at the last prices. Tate's cubes are 6d. up at 63s. 6d., London granulated has gained a similar amount at 60s. 7½d., while Lyle's granulated is 60s. 10½d., at which it is also 6d. up. Foreign descriptions have been firm. West Indian is 1s. up at 29s. White Java has gained 1½d. at 58s. 3d., while Czech granulated is 59s. 3d. Futures are hard. Quotations are: March, 29s.; May, 28s.; August, 27s. 6d.

Coffee.—The market has been very firm, and prices have again advanced. East Indian is 2s. up at 113s., Costa Rica is 109s., Nairobi is 2s. up at 103s., while Santos has gained 1s. at 74s.

Oilseeds.—Linseed has been variable. Indian at 23s. shows a rise of 1s. 3d., while La Plata at 18s. 7½d. is 3d. lower. Cottonseed has been steady. Sakellarides is about the same at 12s. 4½d., while Egyptian black is 13s. 7½d. Rapeseed has been firm, with Toria at 20s. 3d., a gain of 9d., and real bold Ferozepore 7½d. up at 20s. 1½d.

Seed Oils.—Linseed has hardened, and at 43s. 6d. is 6d. up. Rape oil is firm, crude being 6d. up at 45s. 6d., while technical refined has gained 6d. at 48s. Cotton oil has been steady. Refined common edible is unchanged at 48s. 6d., Bombay crude is unchanged at 42s., Egyptian crude is 6d. up at 44s., technical is the same at 46s., while deodorised has gained 6d. at 50s. 6d.

Oilcakes.—The market has been steady. Linseed cake is unchanged at 280s., coconut cake is the same at 195s., while cottonseed cake is unaltered at 175s.

Dried Fruit.—A firm tendency has ruled generally. Currants have been in good request, especially for the Continent, and prices have ruled harder. Sultanas have also been in strong demand for the Continent and prices are higher all along the line. Plums have again been the medium of a substantial business. A very active trade has been done in figs, and supplies are now very short. Dates continue to move off well.

Green Fruit.—Oranges have hardened, supplies being now no more than adequate to meet requirements. The demand for this commodity is now on the up grade. Quotations are:—Valencias, boxes (240's to 504's), 9s. to 23s.; Jaffas, boxes (144's to 152's), 16s. 6d. to 17s. 6d. The position with regard to lemons is practically unchanged. Quotations are: Cases (300's), 15s. to 18s. 6d.; boxes (300's), 10s. 6d. to 13s. 6d. The demand for apples has continued to increase, and prices have begun to advance.

The value of Yugoslavia's exports for the three months ended September 30 was 2,168,033,199 dinars, as compared with 958,181,683 dinars for the corresponding period of 1922.

TURKISH MARKET FOR AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS.

In selling agricultural machinery in Turkey the three principal factors to be taken into consideration are service, price, and simplicity of construction (says an American Consular report). The farmers show a strong preference for things with which they are familiar, and for this reason after a line has been introduced it has a distinct advantage over less well-known lines. Distinctive trade-marks and trade names are therefore very useful. This tendency is illustrated by the preference for the German type of plough with a forecarriage. The preference is the result of sales by the Baghdad Railway Co. of German implements of various kinds to farmers along the line of the railroad. On the other hand, in the Smyrna region, where American-type ploughs have been introduced, the peasants will have nothing else. This preference for familiar things is carried at times to ridiculous extremes, as witnessed by the prospective purchaser of a reaper who refused to buy because the tool box on the machine offered was painted black whereas the tool box on the machine which he wanted was painted red.

The internal-combustion tractor has been introduced into Turkey since the war. For many years before the war large German steam tractors were used in Turkey, principally in Anatolia, and until recently they were the only types used. Since the introduction of the gasoline and kerosene tractor the light wheel type has become the most popular. Turkish soil is, however, very heavy for the most part, and tractors must be sufficiently powered to take care of the heavy work they must do. They are used both for field work in ploughing and pulling reapers and mowers and for belt work. Very few track-laying tractors have been imported.

Tractors are sold together with ploughs. The usual combination is a two-bottom gang plough, while a two-disc gang plough is also popular. Very often a tractor owner buys both types. A demand exists for ploughs to be used with oxen, the natives preferring a one-handled plough similar to the German plough mentioned above. Chilled cast-iron ploughs, 7 and 12-in., are the best for Turkish soil. Ordinary cast-iron ploughs have often been received at the destination broken.

The harrow is not considered an essential implement by the Turkish peasant and there is not a large demand for it. Tooth harrows are used with horses or oxen, while the disc harrow is generally used only with tractors. The latter type is preferred in such parts of the country as Thrace, where the soil is heavy. As the peasant sows all his crops by hand, there is almost no demand for seeders, although as is the case with all implements, a great deal might be accomplished by practical demonstrations and educational work.

The reaper is preferred to the binder in gathering grain crops, for getting an adequate and cheap supply of twine is most uncertain. Reapers and mowers should have a clearance of 10 ins. between the knife and the ground. Those offered for sale in Cilicia should be furnished with two-cutter bars—one should have saw-tooth blades, while the other should have the ordinary knife-edged blades. The usual crops are wheat and cotton, planted in rotation, thus it often happens that there will be occasional stalks of cotton growing in with the wheat, putting too much strain on the ordinary cutter bar.

German corn shellers have been used for a number of years along the Black Sea coast, which is the corn-growing section of Turkey. The market for motor-driven grist-mills and grinding machines offers opportunities for large sales. Hand mills are not popular. Mills are not used for grinding cattle feed, but as small flour mills, for grinding flour of the whole grain. Therefore, they must grind finer than the ordinary gristmill and must also be capable of separating the chaff and dirt from the grain. Few windmills are used and there is not a large market for them. Pumps are quite largely used. Pitchermouth pumps are preferred to all others. Threshers intended for sale in Turkey must have a "bruiser" attachment to cut up the straw finely. At present English and Czecho-Slovak machines are preferred to American threshers. The United States is the leading supplier of agricultural implements to this market. Turkish purchases have not been large since the war, but the need for modern implements and labour-saving devices on the farms is great because of the reduced man-power of the country, and also because of the heavy losses of work animals consequent upon their use for military purposes. Therefore, the potential market is large.

SUDAN PRODUCE.

The following extracts are taken from the December issue of the report of the Central Economic Board of the Sudan Government:—

Gum.

The exports of gum during November were as follows, in tons (the value being shown in brackets):—Via Port Sudan; Bleached, 29 (£E1,967); hashab, 900 (£E38,134); talh, 34 (£E685).

Kordofan Province.—5,192 kantars were sold in El Obeid market during the month of November, as against 64 kantars during the same period last year. The average price was £E1.109 m/ms. per kantar. The arrivals at El Obeid from Nahud were 5,697 kantars, as against 152 kantars last year. The amount sold at Nahud during the month was 11,306 kantars, as against 250 kantars last year, the average price being 949 m/ms. per kantar. 1,456 kantars were sold at Um Ruaba at an average price of £E1.056 the kantar, as against 95 kantars last year. At Rahad, 2,038 kantars were sold at an average price £E1.065 m/ms., as against 741 kantars during corresponding month last year.

Nuba Mountains Province.—Preparations for opening a gum market at Kaka are proceeding.

White Nile Province.—1,362 kantars of gum were exported from Tendelti during the month at an average price of P.T.110 per kantar.

Fung Province.—152 kantars of hashab and 12 kantars of talh gum were imported into Singa.

Cotton.

Berber Province.—Bouga Pumping Station.—Cotton looks promising on the whole, and picking has just begun. Kitiab Pumping Station.—Cotton is now coming in freely. Most of it at present is coming from Gabrab and Kitiab. Nuba and Hanik have increased deliveries during the last week, but the crop in these two villages is later than in the two former, owing to greater growth of the plants. During the month 268 kantars of 315 rottles (unginned) of cotton were delivered to store, making the total to end of November 289 kantars.

Dongola Province.—Gureir.—Area of crop, 323 feddans. The cotton is looking very well, and bolls are opening well. A certain amount has already been picked, and picking should be general in December. Nuri.—About 40-50 feddans of American cotton have been planted by sagia cultivators at Deuem Bellal and Hamdab. It is looking very well. Gendettu.—Cotton weighed in to date amounts to 413 kantars of 315 rottles (unginned), and there is at least 200 kantars picked in the southern half of the scheme and waiting boat transport. Last season no cotton was picked in November. Bolls are now opening freely in spite of somewhat cool weather, and prospects remain good.

Dates.

Dongola Province.—The census of date trees in Merowe Markaz shows the approximate increase over the last census in 1918 to be 29,500 trees.

Halfa Province.—The purchasing of dates this year has been very slow, and there still remains large quantities upon the hands of the growers unsold. The current prices in Wadi Halfa, per sack of 145 kilos, are as follows:—Barakawi, £E1.800 m/ms.; Gondeila, £E2.400 m/ms.; Gorgoda, £E1.500 m/ms.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

PROPOSED CZERNAVODA-CONSTANTZA CANAL.

The Roumanian Government is planning to construct a canal from Czernavoda on the River Danube to Constantza, the well-known Black Sea port of that country (says the American Vice-Consul at Constantza, Mr. Richard B. Haven, in a recent report). The proposed canal would shorten by 250 miles the present route from Danube ports to the Black Sea. Barges will be built to discharge to ocean vessels their full complement of cargo at Constantza. Definite plans are under way, and the construction of this canal will be undertaken during the spring of 1924.

FORTHCOMING SAILINGS.

The following are the sailings for the Near East and India, the ports of departure and closing dates for cargo being given in parentheses:—

Anchor Line.—S.s. Castalia for Bombay (Liverpool, January 25).

Anchor Brocklebank Line.—S.s. Maikar for Port Said, Colombo, Madras, and Calcutta (London, January 26); s.s. Manipur for Calcutta (Birkenhead, January 31).

Bibby Line.—S.s. Warwickshire for Port Said, Colombo, and Rangoon (Birkenhead, January 30).

British India Line.—S.s. Dumana for Bombay and Karachi (London, February 1); s.s. Nevasa for Colombo, Madras, and Calcutta (London, February 2).

Clan Line.—S.s. Clan MacBean for Bombay and Persian Gulf (Birkenhead, February 1).

Ellerman "City" Line.—S.s. City of London for Bombay (Birkenhead, February 5).

Ellerman Lines.—S.s. Grodno for Malta, Patras, Piræus, Syra, Volo, Salonika, Smyrna, Constantinople, Bourgas, Varna, and Constantza (Liverpool, February 2).

Ellerman, Westcott, and Laurance Lines.—S.s. Eden Hall for Gibraltar, Malta, and Alexandria (London, February 6).

Johnston Line.—S.s. Kenmore for Piræus, Syra, Volo, Salonika, Smyrna, Constantinople, Bourgas, Varna, and Constantza (Liverpool, January 26); s.s. Quernmore, for Galatz and Braila (Liverpool, February 9); s.s. Sycamore for Piræus, Volo, Salonika, Bourgas, Varna, Constantza, Sulina, Galatz, and Braila (Liverpool, February 23).

Moss Line.—S.s. Edfou for Gibraltar, Malta, Piræus, Smyrna, Salonika, Constantinople, Bourgas, Varna, and Constantza (Liverpool, February 9).

Stock and Share Markets.

AN UNSETTLED TENDENCY.

The Prospects.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday Morning.

A very uncertain tendency has ruled on the Stock Exchange during the past week, and yesterday the markets were decidedly unsettled owing to a variety of adverse causes. The railway strike naturally had a depressing effect, and the unfavourable political situation had a decided influence, while superimposed on these two factors we had a serious break in the exchanges.

Need for Stability.

It is almost hopeless to attempt to forecast the immediate future of the markets. It can, I suppose, be assumed that the advent of a Labour Government has by now been very largely discounted (though it would be unwise to generalise on this point), but as long as the strike continues the markets are bound to be stagnant. One ought to take as optimistic a view as possible, but it must be admitted that there is nothing very encouraging in the general outlook. Stability at home and abroad is required if the markets are to develop anything approaching a buoyant tone. In the meantime, there is nothing for holders to do but to sit tight. This is certainly no time for disposing of any holding.

Better Tone in Gilt-Edged.

Gilt-edged have been variable during the week, but despite the development of weakness yesterday make a rather better showing than a week ago. Consols at 55 are ⅜ up, the Conversion Loan at 74⅞ has gained ½, War Loan Fives at 98 15-16 are 5-16 up, while Fundings at 85⅛ are ⅞ up. Indian stocks are about the same, the Three per Cents. being 54, a gain of ¼, the 5½ per Cents. being unchanged at 99½, while the Seven per Cent. Loan is a point lower at 111½. The Sudan 4½ per Cent. Loan is 93, at which it is a point down.

Foreign Stocks Variable.

A variable tone has ruled in the market in Foreign Government securities, and here again, while prices are a shade better on the week in some cases, the tone yesterday was weak on the fluctuations in the exchanges. French stocks show little change, both War Loan Fives and the Four per Cent. Loan being ¼ up at 22¼ and 18¼ respectively. The movements in German stocks have provided the sensation of the week, and substantial profits, it may be added, to those who long ago were shrewd enough to see the prospects of these securities as a speculative medium. Some indication of the fluctuations will be gathered from the fact that the Three per Cents. closed yesterday at 1 3-16, a gain of 2s. 9d. on the week, but representing a fall of 10s. 3d. in the course of yesterday. The 3½ per Cents. are now 8s. 6d., and in this case the fall yesterday amounted to 5s. 6d. Italian Rentes have been a strong spot, and at 20½ show a gain of 2. In Near Eastern securities Turkish Unified have been weak, and at 16¼ are ¾ lower. Greek stocks have been steady, with Monopolies unchanged at 22½.

Industrials Quiet and Steady.

On the whole, the Industrial group has made quite a good showing, and the steadiness of this market has indeed been one of the features of the week. It is true that there has been the minimum of activity, but the shares have generally been quite firm, and in a number of cases price changes have been in the upward direction.

Textile shares have improved, with Courtaulds 6d. up at 59s. 6d., while Coats are unchanged at 60s. 3d. Engineering and iron and steel shares closed yesterday on a dull note, though prices are a shade harder on the week. Armstrongs are 6d. up at 16s., Guest Keens are 6d. lower at 37s. 6d., while Vickers at 13s. 3d. are unchanged. In shipping securities P. and O. Deferred are a point lower at 282, Cunards are unchanged at 18s. 9d., while Furness Withys are unaltered at 27s. 6d.

Tobacco shares have been firm, with Bats 1s. 6d. up at 98s. 6d., while Imperial Tobaccos have gained 2s. 3d. at 69s. 3d. Bank shares have been firm. Chartered of India at 19¼ are 1-16 up, Imperial of Persia are ⅛ up at 7⅜, P. and O. Banks are unchanged at 12, National of Egypt are ¼ down at 24⅛, while Westminster Banks are ⅜ down at 16¼.

Oils Quiet.

A quiet tone ruled in oil descriptions yesterday, but there was no development of weakness, and in several directions a strong tendency has been in evidence. Prices, however, in some cases are slightly down on the week. Burmahs at 4 7-16 are ¼ lower, while Anglo-Persians at 2 19-32 are 5-32 up. In the Egyptian group Anglo-Egyptian B are 1-16 down at 1 1-16, while Gemsah Oil Reefs are 3-16. Among Roumanians, Dacia Romanas are 6d. down at 11s. 6d., Phœnix are 6d. up at 18s. 3d., while Steaua Romanas are 9d. down at 7s. 9d.

Colonel Holmes, general manager of the Palestine Railways, has gone to Amman (Transjordania) to discuss the future status of the Hejaz Railway with King Hussein (says a Reuter message from Jerusalem).

The British Overseas Bank announces that in connection with the recent alteration in the constitution, the following have been appointed directors: Mr. James Caird, the Earl of Chichester, Mr. Henry Hoare, and the Hon. Henry Duncan McLaren.

The December report of the Minerva (Roumania) Oil Co., Ltd., states: "Moreni.—Plot 34 Well No. 1: Drilled 16 metres, total depth 16 metres. Plot 2 Well No. 2: Derrick and sheds erected; transporting machinery. Royalty plot 113 No. 106: Continues to flow, and has yielded to date 13,500 tons. Runcu.—Plot 1 participating Well No. 1: Total depth, 493 metres; inserted column and prepared for cementation. Plot 1 participating Well No. 3: Drilled 25 metres, total depth 465 metres. Plot 17 No. 2: Freeing column."

Company Meetings.

IONIAN BANK.

The annual general meeting of the Ionian Bank, Ltd., was held on January 22 at the offices of the bank, Basildon House, Moorgate, E.C.2, Sir John Stavridi (the chairman) presiding.

The Secretary (Mr. W. A. Shaw) having read the notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors,

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, said:—I can assure you, gentlemen, that your directors saw the year 1923 pass out of sight with a sense of relief. It has been for Greece one long nightmare of revolution, counter-revolution, civil war, and financial chaos, and we feel convinced that, whatever the future may have in store for that long-suffering nation, nothing can well be worse than the year 1923. To have come through all these trials and tribulations without serious loss, and to be able to maintain our dividend and add materially to our reserves, is a source of real satisfaction, and we must admit that, had it not been for the ceaseless care, attention, foresight, and devotion to duty of our administrative officers in Greece, such a result could not have been attained.

Shortly after the commencement of the financial year under review the revolutionary Government came into power. At first its administration of the country was conducted on conservative lines. During the last six months, however, this policy changed, and the Government brought forward four undigested measures of taxation which have caused grave prejudice to the country and destroyed the prestige of the Government. These measures were: (1) Increased taxation of limited companies; (2) confiscation of the gold funds deposited with the banks; (3) capital levy; (4) taxation of business turnover. The three first were actually put into force after some more or less serious modifications of the original proposals; the fate of the fourth, however, remains still undecided, but I trust that for the sake of the welfare of the commerce and industry of the country it will be finally abandoned.

Under the revolutionary Government the finances of Greece have gone from bad to worse. It had been hoped that, on the advent of peace with Turkey, the military expenditure would be cut down to the absolute minimum. So far from this being done, it would appear from the Budget forecast for the year 1923-24 that the military expenditure accounts for two-thirds of the extraordinary expenditure of the State. The only hope of salvation for the country is the drastic reduction of this item, and it is to be hoped that the new Government which has just been formed will take the matter in hand without fear and without delay. Even if to-day a stop were put to the army expenditure, there would be a long uphill struggle before Greece could repair her finances, and if this is not done the position is bound to become extremely serious, for the annual budget deficit is growing at an accentuated pace.

The financial measures which were adopted in order to balance the budgets of 1921-1922 and 1922-1923 cannot be repeated. Greece cannot stand another forced loan, nor can she stand another doubling of the income-tax. Such financial measures are emergency measures, and justifiable only during war time. And even if it were possible to borrow in order to meet the 1923-1924 deficit such a step could not be regarded as a solution of the problem. The country cannot afford her present rate of extraordinary expenditure, nor to borrow in order to meet such expenditure. Yet you will perceive from a comparison of the budget of 1922-1923 with that of 1923-1924 that the item alone of extraordinary expenditure is increasing by leaps and bounds.

Of the drs. 3,662 millions extraordinary expenditure budgeted for 1923-1924 drs. 2,347 millions are for exceptional war expenditure. As to the taxable capacity of the country it is difficult to speak. The revenue returns certainly display extraordinary elasticity. The actual revenue receipts for the year 1922-1923 show an ordinary or taxation revenue of drs. 1,593,964,924, as against drs. 920 millions for the preceding year, or an increase of nearly 60 per cent. in a single year. Again, the revenues pledged to the international Financial Commission produced in 1921 drs. 259,929,905; 1922 drs. 462,541,543, leaving a free margin of drs. 180,000,000; (anticipated for) 1923 drs. 1,200,000,000. But it is a moot point how far these increases are a mere expression of the depreciation of the drachma; and under any conditions it would be absurd to expect the taxable capacity of the country to continue doubling itself year after year.

With regard to the drachma exchange, as things are at the moment this question turns entirely upon public finance. If the exchanges were not being manipulated, and if Greece could cut off completely her extraordinary budget, and so prevent the necessity of forced issue of paper, and thereby the depreciation of the drachma, the problem of the exchange would be comparatively simple. Greece has to meet two exchange demands. Firstly, on the service of her debt borrowed in gold. Secondly, for the needs of her commerce. The service of her gold debt is by no means a formidable item. The total interest payable in gold hardly exceeds £2¼ millions.

The report was adopted.

GREAT INDIAN PENINSULA RAILWAY.

The half-yearly general meeting of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company was held on January 18 at the company's offices, 48, Copthall Avenue, London Wall, E.C. Sir Charles H. Armstrong (chairman of the company) presided.

The Secretary (Mr. R. H. Walpole) having read the notice convening the meeting,

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, said that the gross receipts for the half-year were 6¼ crores of rupees, or 50½ lakhs less than in the corresponding period of the previous year. The expenditure, on the other hand, was only 4.68 crores, against 5.72 crores, a difference of 104 lakhs, which increased the net revenue for the half-year by 53½ lakhs, an excess of 51.39 per cent. on the corresponding figure for 1922-1923. After taking interest charges to account, the final result was a deficit of 37.95 lakhs, against 84.02 lakhs in the corresponding period. The last monsoon, generally speaking, was a good one all over India, and in the districts served by the railway good crops were now being reaped. The cotton crop in some parts of the country was a full one, and as prices ruled high in consuming markets there ought to be a rapid movement from the interior towns to the coast, which, he hoped, would keep the railways busily employed for some time. As other crops were also likely to give a good yield, their rolling stock ought to be fully employed for six months or more, and at the higher rates of freight now charged the financial result ought to be satisfactory. The gross receipts to date, compared with the same period of last year, were, however, over 50 lakhs in defect, but the position the last few weeks had shown signs of improvement. Everything, excepting perhaps, political conditions, favoured an expanding trade in India.

The electrification of the Harbour Branch was proceeding with considerable rapidity. The opening of this new line in, he hoped, about twelve months from now would be of great assistance to the Bombay cotton trade, now located in its new quarters at Sewri. The electrification of the main line, which would be extended as rapidly as possible to Kalyan, was also being dealt with, and this work, when completed, would greatly facilitate the movement of suburban traffic.

The report was adopted.

A NEW FORM OF INSURANCE.

The Royal Exchange Assurance has recently drawn up a scheme of life insurance which is believed to be unique. The scheme, which is fully explained in a prospectus, is designed to meet the needs of the man who not only realises the importance of making insurance provision during the early years of his business life, but who, at the same time, sees the necessity of the considerably larger insurance which would be required in the event of his marriage. To meet such a case the scheme provides for a definite amount payable on a selected date, and the assured has the option of converting his policy at any time within three months after marriage into a with-profit whole-life contract for double the original sum assured without alteration in premium or further medical examination. When the assured avails himself of this option a guaranteed bonus of £2 10s. per cent. per annum is added to the sum assured. The scheme is one which, it is thought, will be of value and interest to the community.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Treaty Week.

If all treaties can be regarded as instruments of peace, Europe made a notable advance last week towards the goal of permanent peace. Treaties were signed between France and Czecho-Slovakia, between Italy and Yugoslavia, and between Italy and Albania, the latter being a purely commercial agreement. The publication of the text of the Franco-Czecho-Slovakian Treaty does not necessitate any modification of the criticisms passed in these columns last week on the action of the two countries. In spite of the stress laid in Czecho-Slovakia on the absence of any military convention, the first two articles binding the two Governments to consult one another on questions of foreign policy of a kind which might endanger their security or threaten the arrangements established by the post-War treaties, and to agree on measures for safeguarding their common interests, are tantamount to a military pact. Czecho-Slovakia gains nothing that is not already guaranteed her by the League of Nations, and she has adopted the surest way of weakening the authority of that body by subscribing to the doctrine that she must seek protection, at this particular stage, outside it. France, on the other hand, proclaims her contempt of the League, and betrays her fear that her actions may ultimately deprive her of the support of her fellow-members of the Entente. Accordingly, she is looking round betimes to obviate, when that moment arrives, the possibility of isolation. The Franco-Czecho-Slovakian Treaty is the product of an uneasy conscience, on the one hand, and of an unworthy subservience on the other.

Italy and Yugoslavia.

The text of the Conventions between Italy and Yugoslavia, which were signed in Rome on Sunday, has at the moment of writing not been published. These Conventions, however, do settle, at least for the time being, matters of serious dispute between the two countries. In Italy it is noticeable that the agreement evokes virtually unanimous approval, and great hopes are being built on practical co-operation in future between Italy and Yugoslavia. If opinion in the latter country is more divided on the subject, this circumstance may be due in part to the political situation. There is indeed some talk of the Conventions performing for the Yugoslav Opposition what Mr. Baldwin's Protection proposals did for the two wings of the British Liberal Party. M. Raditch, after a period of reflection abroad, is now fully alive to the folly of his political tactics in holding his party aloof from Parliament, and from his place of exile in Vienna is preaching a reunion of the Opposition parties with a view to overthrowing the Radicals on the question of the agreements with Italy. The threat, it may be supposed, will leave unruffled M. Pashitch's enjoyment of the festivities given in his honour in Rome. The view of the Yugoslav Opposition, apparently, is that Italian treatment of Yugoslav minorities leaves something to be desired, and that until the rights of the latter are fully recognised there should be no agreement with Italy. This attitude ignores the virtue in the adage that half a loaf is better than no bread, and fails to appreciate the powerful lever that the Conventions will place in Yugoslavia's hands for winning Italian recognition of the justice of her claims in other directions. The treaty, it may be added, is essentially a defensive alliance.

The Issue in Greece.

In Greece the political wind is blowing very strongly from the republican quarter. Perhaps it would be more correct to call it the politicians' wind, for at the moment it is the politicians in Athens who are doing all the talking. M. Venizelos loses no opportunity of declaring himself wholly in favour of a republic, while disclaiming any desire to influence the opinion of anyone else. The majority of the speakers in the Chamber appear to be republicans, who announce their resolve to secure a republican system—by force, if necessary. In the face of these attempts to stampede them, the people of Greece will need very special organisation, backed by unswerving loyalty to the old régime, if they wish to maintain the monarchical system. It is of no use to inveigh against their opponents' tactics in sending the King away and keeping him out of the country. Starting from the present position, the proposal of a plébiscite is strictly fair, and it is up to the Greek people to show by their votes whether their loyalty to the Throne is strong enough to make them take the trouble to couch a lance for the dynasty. The Monarchist leaders have a clear duty before them. It is to co-operate whole-heartedly with M. Venizelos to secure the absolute impartiality of the plébiscite, and to encourage their followers to take advantage of the opportunity afforded them. Any attempt to run away from the challenge, on whatever pretext, will merely convince the world that the republican theory does really hold the field in Greece.

The New Egyptian Government.

Zaghloul Pasha has accepted office as Prime Minister of Egypt, and has formed his first Cabinet. Although its composition is entirely Zaghloulist, it includes three Ministers who have hitherto only accorded their nominal support to the Wafd, without being members of it. These are Mazloum Pasha, who becomes Minister of Wakf (Pious Foundations), Mohammed Pasha Said, Minister of Education, and Tewfik Pasha Nessim, Minister of Finance. Zaghloul Pasha has stipulated that his acceptance of office does not imply recognition of any situation against which the Wafd has protested, with special reference to "the necessity for the country's enjoying its rights of real independence in Egypt and the Sudan, with due respect to all foreign rights not conflicting with that independence." Such a declaration may mean much or little; but if the new Cabinet is sincere in welcoming the advent to power in Great Britain of a Labour Government, it is to be hoped that it will imitate Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's policy of work and economy of words. On Zaghloul Pasha's own showing, there are many things in Egypt calling for immediate attention; nothing that the Egyptian Cabinet can say or do will add one jot or tittle by way of improvement to the situation in the Sudan.

The Hejaz Railway.

If King Hussein's visit to Transjordania achieves no other results, it may yet mark a notable epoch in the history of the Hejaz Railway. This line, which was completed as far as Medina on August 31, 1908, was the hall-mark of national feeling and Moslem solidarity in Turkey under Abdul Hamid. The Sultan himself was in all probability mainly concerned to add prestige to his Khalifate, and to strengthen his position in the Hejaz by means of a railway built by funds to which Moslems all over the world contributed. During the War the line was badly damaged, and until recently only the northern section, between Damascus and Ma'an, was in operation. The southern part has now been put in working order, and trains are again running to Medina. A serious difficulty has been the dearth of rolling-stock. King Hussein, it is reported from Amman, has not only ordered fifteen locomotives and a hundred cars, but has also concluded an agreement with the Sheikhs through whose territory the line passes, whereby each assumes responsibility for the safety of the line in his section. When Jeddah and Medina are connected by a railway line—which need not enter the city of Mecca—the Hejaz will have taken a considerable step forward towards the position to which its ruler is supposed to aspire in the Arab world.

India and the New Ministry.

India is exceptionally well represented in the new Ministry. It is true that neither Sir Sydney Olivier nor Professor Richards has personal experience of the work before them, but both of them bring to Whitehall qualifications which are certainly unusual, and which may prove to be valuable, while three other members of the Cabinet have in different ways been behind the Indian scenes. As regards Lord Chelmsford's position, it is sufficient to recall that he is one of the designers of the existing Constitution, and that he stands decisively for orderly progress under the control of Parliament. Colonel Wedgwood, on the other hand, has enjoyed the useful experience of taking part in at least one Extremist Congress, at the end of which he gave the audience some remarkably straight talk, while the Prime Minister himself was a member of the last Public Service Commission, and has published the results of his studies in a book which showed that he had realised the essence of the central Indian problem, even if he was occasionally misled regarding concrete facts. The three men working as a team might draw India a quite long way on the road before her: let us hope they may not be tempted to pull different ways.

Economists in Whitehall.

As regards the India Office itself, the outstanding fact is that both the Secretary of State and his understudy possess knowledge and experience which will enable them to grasp the fundamental structure of India more rapidly and certainly than is possible for the ordinary town-bred administrator. Sir Sydney Olivier has, of course, been Secretary to the Board of Agriculture in this country, but that fact is not particularly relevant, and we are thinking rather of his wide experience of peasant agriculture in the Dependencies. Professor Richards, a recognised economist, has specialised in the subject of small holdings, which so very few people in England really understand, and it is reasonable to hope that in the new conditions Whitehall will see India as it really is, a huge mass of peasants, just beginning to wake up, but still thinking much more about the weather and the markets than the political questions which look so exciting at this distance. There have already been hints that India must expect a doctrinaire régime, and we admit that the danger exists, but, speaking for ourselves, we are not disposed to quarrel with the doctrine that in an overwhelmingly peasant country the interests of the peasants should come first.

The Prime Minister on India.

It is easy to understand the perturbation which has been caused among the extremists in India by Mr. MacDonald's message, with its uncompromising denunciation of their tactics, for, owing to a variety of causes, they had slipped into the easy belief that they carried the Labour Party in their pocket, and their plans for an "ultimatum" to Parliament were obviously based mainly on the expectation of Labour support. We take it, however, that the Prime Minister speaks for the country when he declares that "no party in Great Britain will be cowed by threats of force or by policies designed to bring government to a standstill," and he has followed sound tactics in getting in his ultimatum first. There has, of course, never been any real basis for an alliance between the most democratic party in England and the men in India who want to put back the clock and eliminate the English influence, which, for the first time in the history of the country, has given the Indian working classes something like a chance, or, at least, the hope of a chance. In so far as Mr. MacDonald's message makes that clear, it represents one more step towards the establishment of real values in the field of Indian politics.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

The Labour Government.

The new Government has been received with an extraordinary absence of signs of disapproval: there have, indeed, been attempts on the part of erstwhile opponents to curry favour with it in advance. Fanatics who but a short time ago were shrieking that the direfullest calamities would befall us if Labour were to come into power are now pleading that the destroyers must be given a fair run—even the Daily Herald is moved to gratification over the reception by the "Capitalist Press" of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's Cabinet.

In other words, the major portion of our Press is licksplittling; it is worshipping temporary facts at the expense of what should be eternal principles.

What is felt generally about the advent of this Labour Cabinet is this: First, that undoubtedly a new force has come into our politics, a pulsating, idealistic force, and then that, apart from this idealism, the Labour Cabinet in no way represents the country. The ordinary man feels that there is in this Cabinet little of the spirit that carried us through the War; among the Ministers there is scarcely a man who has had fighting experience—there are, on the contrary, more than one who did their best to defeat the intentions of the main body of the people of this country. It is possible, of course, to hear here and there that conduct defended on the ground that it needed pluck in the time of the War to go against the country; but such childish reasoning is not seriously listened to.

The Cabinet.

When the list of names of the new Cabinet was published, three feelings were uppermost in the country—relief, surprise, and anger. The fearful—and they included thousands—were genuinely relieved when they found that their ignorant anxieties were removed by Mr. MacDonald's so eminently respectable selection—stocks went gleefully bounding up; the curious were amazed at the moderation of the Premier's choice; and among the stalwarts of Labour indignation was felt at the inclusion of so many "workers by brain" only.

It can be said at once that this Cabinet is distinguished for its intellectual strength: in this respect it makes recent Cabinets look small. Judged by an absolute standard, it comes out well; there is an admirable balance between intellectual and practical conviction. Some of the appointments were a foregone conclusion; but it was not anticipated that Labour would make such a good paper showing as this. In one respect, however, it differs little from its predecessors; certain posts have been filled by people not eminently fitted for them. But the division of the spoils cannot have been an easy job, and, taking Mr. Ramsay MacDonald for what he is, and into account the material with which he had to deal, one must say that he has made his playing hand almost as good as his trumps.

But the academic and doctrinaire traits of the new Cabinet cannot be overlooked; they shout at one from the hill-tops. Men who for many years have been following a formula now find themselves in power, and it is too late to hope that they will be able at this time of their lives to infuse any humanity into it. Humanitarianism, yes; but that is the curse of the Labour Party. They cannot indulge their pity for the oppressed without becoming sentimental about it. The truth of this we shall see soonest of all in foreign affairs. It is in that field, one imagines, that the new Government will most often show its impotence, and, incidentally, its unrepresentative character.

The "Fiasco" Strike.

It is possible that the present railway strike will go down into history as the "Fiasco" strike, for that was the exaggerated description which the Secretary of State for the Colonies (he was not speaking as such, of course, but mainly as the representative of the Union rival to Mr. Bromley's) so light-heartedly gave to it. On the old Great Northern and Great Eastern lines the passenger service has been appalling, although doubtless the best in the circumstances possible. To question the inconvenience that the strikers have caused is puerile, and all the talk in the newspapers about the improved train service is unnoticeable to the ordinary traveller.

It appears, however, that early this morning the strike was settled, although the terms are not yet known. By this evening, therefore, the service should be normal. Meanwhile we shiver and roll and stew in buses, trams, and tubes.

Lenin.

It was interesting to read the various comments upon the death of Lenin. There appeared to be few journals which recognised the greatness of the man. It would seem that to the normal Englishman Lenin was a sort of second Kaiser: he was a bad lot, who prevented the early resumption of peace and trade, and that was enough to damn him! As usual, the Morning Post got very near to the truth without actually touching it: Lenin appeared to it as a kind of Ahriman.

Whatever be the explanation of Lenin's success, it is doubtful whether history can show another such man. He was the essence of inhuman, impersonal one-idead-ness, and it is impossible to restrain admiration for anything so extraordinary. He was an absolute man (or devil), and time alone can prove whether he was right. But that time will not arrive until the problem of the Jews, with whom Lenin was inextricably linked up, is resolved.

The Labour Party, I believe, think Trotsky is much more amenable than Lenin was, so that we may look to quite early developments in Anglo-Russian relations.

A Commission of Fine Arts.

It would be a grim comment upon Mr. Baldwin's administration if it were said that its main achievement had been the creation of a Commission of Fine Arts; but that, at any rate, would seem to be its chief claim to having changed the habits of the British people. The people of this country loathes officialdom in its art, and something extremely bad had to happen before it would sanction the appointment of an official body of advisers.

But, as everyone with eyes knows, things very bad have happened, and in distressing abundance. Look at the memorials, the buildings, the posters, the advertisements, and so on, that we have suffered since the War, and then say whether some sort of guidance is not necessary! I do not suggest that the inhabitants of our towns ever look at the so-called works of art in their midst, but foreigners do, and our prestige suffers accordingly. With this Commission in being, it may be hoped that we shall be spared such eyesores as the Cavell Memorial, the blinking advertisements at the Scotsman's cinema, the demolition of worthy ancient buildings, and so on. It should be added, in defence of Mr. Baldwin's expiring act, that this Commission is only an advisory body, and will not originate anything.

The Plays of Barrie.

Sir James Barrie has at the present time in London three plays and a one-act play running, and two more in rehearsal. It is, one imagines, an almost unique spectacle. If you admire Barrie I suppose you are very happy about it, but it does rather reflect on our other dramatists. To revive "The Little Minister," "Quality Street," "Alice-Sit-by-the-Fire," and the rest of them, however pleasant they may be, suggests a dearth of dramatists which, I believe, is not justified. The only satisfactory explanation is the old, self-depreciatory one—that we are not an artistic people, that the theatre is merely a commercial institution, and that Barrie plays because he pays. It is only a few weeks ago that a season of Shakespeare at the Kingsway had to be abandoned because it did not pay!

The Panel Doctors' Fee.

No student of English institutions could have failed to guess correctly the decision of the Court of Inquiry into the disputed capitation fee for panel doctors. It will be remembered that the late Minister of Health, Sir William Joynson-Hicks (who, I understand, is the Daily Mail's last and perhaps least find for the leadership of the Conservative Party) wished the doctors to receive 8s. 6d. and the doctors wanted 9s. 6d. To relate, therefore, that it has been decided to give them 9s. seems quite superfluous.

Burns Night.

The memory of Robert Burns was honoured the other day with a good deal of gusto in many parts of Britain. The immortal part of Burns is, of course, his lyric flow, but there were certain other proclivities of the poet which are deemed to be imperishable, or, at any rate, are annually and without fail imitated. The Prohibitionists will have to eradicate the memory of Burns before their victory is complete.

The coincidence of the Labour Government and this celebration of Burns is quite accidental, but it is not without what the journalists call piquance. 1924 is not the first year in which the sons of toil have succeeded in life. Apropos of this, I remember hearing, in the years before the War, the present Prime Minister asking passionately whether the fact that Burns had to work made any difference to the beauty of his verse. To which the obvious question was asked in return whether the fact that Swinburne did not have to work made any difference to his!

Village Life.

One of the most remarkable features of modern social life lies in the decay of village life. People recognise this decay; they know that it is highly undesirable, but are impotent to do anything to arrest it. The flight of workers to the town from the village goes on unchecked, and with it are departing the arts and the crafts that for so long were the pride of English country life. Its source is, of course, deep in economics; but in its effects it touches the æsthetic, the creative, and very probably the spiritual natures of our people. Now it is chiefly by artists that a revival of village life is desired; the other day, for instance, we had Mr. Rutland Boughton saying that England would again hum with budding Purcells if we could but revive the tradition and the reality of country life. And little artistic efforts on the William Morris principle are quite fashionable. But the one man who really could tell us how to solve the problem—that of keeping the agriculturist on the land—is silent. Meanwhile, the rustics fall like silly moths before the electric glare of the towns, and our countryside "falls into great decay," in which it is scarcely possible now to find even a decent cricket green. One supposes that things will have to get a little worse before another William Cobbett arises.

Cairo, January 13.

The Zaghloulist Triumph.

Although results have not yet been received from all the constituencies, while in a score of others there will be a second election on January 17 on account of the failure of any candidate to secure a clear majority over all his rivals, yesterday's polling in the final stage of the elections for the Chamber of Deputies has put the eventual result beyond all possible doubt. The Zaghloulists have secured a victory more complete even than they had hoped for. In the 133 constituencies of which the results have been received in Cairo up to the time of writing, 113 Zaghloulist candidates, four Liberal Constitutionals, two Nationalists, and fourteen Independents have been returned. Even assuming that all the Independents are Liberal Constitutionals in disguise, this would give the followers of Adly Pasha only a total of seventeen seats up to the present, and, so far as can be judged, they will be exceedingly fortunate to secure another ten in the eighty odd constituencies where the result of the polling is still unknown. The victory of the Wafd is even more striking than the figures would make it appear, for, without having had a single one of the party's leading members defeated, the Zaghloulists have won in constituencies where they were opposed to the strongest candidates of the Nationalists and Liberal Constitutionals. The "Big Five" of the Nationalist Party, Aly Bey Kamel, Sheikh Abdel Aziz Shawish, Hafez Bey Ramadan, Said Bey Telemat, and Ahmed Bey Loutfi, have all been beaten, some of them by crushing majorities. The firebrand Sheikh Shawish, on whom the Nationalists had set much hope, could muster only seventy odd votes in the Gumrouk constituency of Alexandria, against the three hundred and fifty of his Zaghloulist opponent, Mohammed Pasha Said. Similarly with the Liberal Constitutionals, Ismail Pasha Sidky, former Minister of Finance, has been beaten by a Wafd candidate unknown outside his own district, Tewfik Bey Doss, one of the cleverest lawyers in the country, and a particular star of the Liberal Constitutionals, has lost at Assiut, formerly considered one of the party's strongholds. Aly Bey Manzalawi, Mohammed Mahfouz Pasha, and Abdel Latif Bey Mekabbati, all very wealthy landowners, could not win the constituencies in which their properties are situated, and where they have been thought to exercise almost feudal sway, from comparatively insignificant Zaghloulists.

Lack of an Opposition.

There will be no effective opposition in the Chamber. Although there may be a score or thirty members opposed to the Zaghloulists, there will not be among them, so far as can be foreseen, a single one with the qualities required in a leader. Indeed, it seems doubtful whether the Liberal Constitutionals and the Nationalists will survive in their present form. The Nationalists, for some time past, have been split into two groups, and their disastrous failure in their first experience of asking for popular support of their policy seems likely to complete the severance and to lead to the break-up of the party, possibly as a preliminary to its reconstitution in a new form.

A Peaceful Election.

The polling everywhere, so far as can be ascertained at the moment of writing, went off in complete tranquillity. In Cairo there was certainly, during the hours when voting was in progress, none of the excitement usually associated with elections. Only after dark, when the results began to come in, was there anything like a typical British election crowd. This was in Ataba el Khadra, where one of the big drapery establishments had had the initiative to put up a cinema screen, where the figures were shown as they came in. The crowd cheered heartily at every new Zaghloulist success, so that it was, in fact, cheering practically the whole time. Quite the loudest applause was for the news of the defeat of Sheikh Abdel Aziz Shawish. There was something very encouraging in hearing a crowd of typical poorer-class Egyptians exulting in the defeat of this pestilential agitator, who owed his former great popularity to his ability to appeal to the lower instincts of the more fanatical Moslems. It was an encouraging symptom of Egypt's political development to hear thousands of Moslems execrating this bitter priest who, in the old days, could gather around him quite a following by talking of making shoes for true believers out of Coptic women's skins. Mention of the Copts calls to mind the fact that out of the 130 Deputies elected fourteen are Copts, all of them Zaghloulists. Another interesting item of the elections is the defeat of the Prime Minister, Yehia Pasha Ibrahim, standing as an Independent for the constituency of Sanafin, wherein are situated his family estates, by a comparatively obscure Zaghloulist.

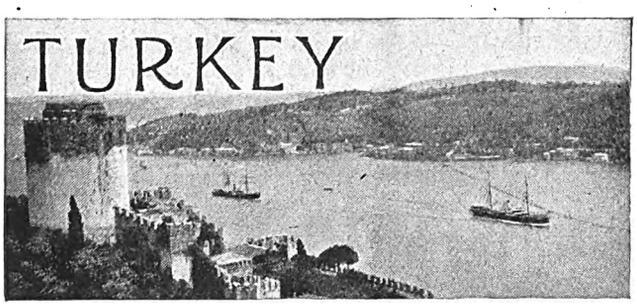
Egypt and Foreign Affairs.

Apart from elections, there has been much of political interest during the past week, and most of it, for a change, has concerned foreign affairs. Egypt is only just entering the stage where she has to fend for herself, and the experience is already bringing one or two slight shocks. For instance, the local Press, accustomed to buttering up Italy, as a true friend of Egypt, has been somewhat pained to find it possible for Italy to disagree entirely with the Egyptian point of view regarding the disposal of Tripolitan sheikhs who have fled over the border and who are claimed by the Italian consul here as being Italian subjects. The matter is a small one, and although not yet settled, doubtless will be arranged in perfect amity, but it has provided a quite novel type of comment in the local newspaper world. So have a series of articles in the Temps, dealing with affairs Egyptian, and mixing up questions so old that they have long been buried and forgotten with others of startling novelty. As an example of the former may be cited the Temps reference to the 1904 negotiations between Great Britain and Abyssinia regarding the utilising of the waters of Lake Tsana as something entirely fresh and very sinister, while at the other end of the scale is the reference to King Fuad as an aspirant for the Khalifate. Cairo is a wonderful city for rumours, and it would have been hard to have named anything possible or impossible as never having been discussed over the coffee cups had not the Temps produced the story of King Fuad and the Khalifate, an idea which, so far as can be judged, has never occurred to anyone in this country. It is quite safe to say that, whatever may be King Fuad's ambitions, a desire to occupy the thorny position of spiritual headship of the Moslem world is certainly not one of them.



Constantinople, January 21.

Budget Estimates.

The Budget estimates continue to occupy the place of honour among the numerous preoccupations of the Assembly. Not that they have yet actually been placed before the House, for it appears that they are undergoing yet another refurbishing in order to bring the estimated expenses down to something near a reasonable prognostication of the total possible receipts. The new Minister of Finance is responsible for giving to a representative of the Anatolian Agency certain broad details on what he calls the final form of the Budget. The receipts are estimated at £T107,500,000, and the expenditure at £T126,900,000; increased revenues are expected from the sale of spirituous liquors, salt, from the tithe, the posts and telegraphs, and the tax for exoneration from military service. Increased expenditure is provided for under the headings of reconstruction, national economy, public works and hygiene, while the other departments have had their demands reduced by the Budget Commission. I should add that another paper on the same day published another set of figures, obtained from a "competent personage," which differed considerably in total and details from the ones I have quoted. The Tanin, which is difficult to hoodwink on financial matters, applauds the "excellent dispositions and the useful spirit of decision" of the Government, but expresses its doubts of the possibility of a windfall to cover the admitted paper deficit, much less the real deficit which is being disguised by the exclusion from the Budget estimates of any provision for the payment of the country's foreign debts on the economically unsound pretext that that question has not yet been negotiated with the Powers.

The Port of Constantinople.

Another important economic problem which is growing more serious every day is the state of the port of Constantinople. At the risk of repetition I can state definitely that the inefficiency of the pilot service since the summary dismissal of all the non-Moslem pilots, the inadequacy of the towage facilities, which consisted of two toy tugs when the generous supply of foreign-owned tugs was immobilised at one fell swoop, the complete absence of any form of salvage appliances and craft since the operations of the two foreign salvage companies were stopped—all this has rendered Constantinople one of the most dangerous ports in the world for shipping. An expert writer in the local Press has dilated in considerable detail on the situation, and he believes that a damaging report has been sent in to Lloyd's, which may have disastrous consequences on the port, and, as a result, on the already catastrophic economic conditions in the city. What is certain is that, if half the stories about the recent experiences of ships in this port are true as they are circulated in maritime circles here, every marine policy ought to have a special clause in it applicable to Constantinople, and then our food would cost us more.

The only overt attempt to deal with the matter seems to be in the annual congress of the Turkish National Union of Commerce, now holding its sittings. The agenda of the Congress lays emphasis on the economic development of this port, but, instead of getting down to something concrete, they waste their time listening to the director of the National Steamship Company, the Seiri Sefain, who emitted some pious hopes that in some far distant time unspecified the missionary work of his company in propagating the gospel of driving the foreigner off the narrow seas and British coal out of the national bunkers would be accomplished.

Acts of the Assembly.

The National Assembly has been steadily engaged in earning its pay. It has decided in principle that the import of British coal shall be prohibited, while their servant, the Director of the Seiri Sefain, has publicly stated that the amount of tonnage available and the condition of the port equipment at Zunguldak render it impossible to get the coal the few miles to Constantinople without incurring disproportionate freight charges. It has also thoroughly aired its views on the immorality of removing the germ-laden curtains that used to flap about the inside of tramcars and pretend to screen the Turkish ladies from the eyes of the profane. It had also an illuminating discussion on the sacrosanctity of crows, whose depredations some impious ones wished to limit by Act of Parliament. It carefully abstained from settling the Anatolian railway dispute, which has had a new lease of life granted it by the election of a new Minister of Public Works, Suleiman Sirri Bey, Deputy for Constantinople in place of Mukhtar Bey.

Mustapha Kemal.

Mustapha Kemal's visit to Smyrna has been a god-send to the local Press. It makes one feel truly Republican to read that he actually went for a ride all by himself in a Smyrna tram (I never do it unless I have a lot of time to waste), that he went for a walk and talked affably with the inhabitants, that he penetrated into various schools and promiscuously patted children on the head!

The Election Returns.

I have to amend the figures of the election returns which I gave in my last letter. They should be as follows:—Liberal Party, 35 seats; personal followers of Ahmet Bey, 24 seats; Popular Party, 18 seats; Independent Groups, 26 seats; total, 103. In all, 68 Mussulmans were elected, 26 Orthodox, and 9 Catholics.

The Constituent Assembly.

On January 21 the Constituent Assembly was opened at Tirana. After a patriotic speech inaugurating the work to be undertaken by the Assembly had been delivered by the Chairman of the High Council of the Regency, the Assembly adjourned for ten days to allow for the formalities of verifying the elections.

The Italo-Albanian Commercial Treaty.

A Commercial Treaty was agreed upon on January 21 between Italy and Albania over the signatures of Signor Mussolini, on the one hand, and of MM. Kol Thaci, Albanian Minister of Finance, and Feizi Alizotti, on the other. After the conclusion of the formalities, the Albanian delegation laid a wreath on the grave of the Unknown Soldier, and courteous speeches were exchanged.

The terms of the Treaty establish most-favoured-nation treatment on all points affecting the commerce between the two countries—e.g., customs, navigation, transit, trading rights, residence, concessions, and so on. Further, two schedules establishing maximum import duties on certain products of Albanian and Italian origin introduced respectively into the territory of the other party are inserted. In the case of Albania these duties represent a very considerable reduction on the ordinary Albanian tariff, certain Italian goods, such as steam boilers, locomotives, electrical machinery, and other machines, marble and quinine being exempt from duties altogether. On the other hand, a number of Albanian-produced raw materials, such as lemons, olives, wool, firewood, hides, silk-cocoons, and so forth are to be admitted free into Italy.

An important clause regarding concessions runs as follows:—"The contracting parties reciprocally bind themselves not to grant monopolies, privileges, or concessions which would result in excluding, to the total profit of the Nationals of one or more third Powers, the Nationals of the other party, in anything connected with one or more branches of commerce or industry."

Bishop Fan Noli.

Towards the close of the year 1923 Bishop Fan Noli was duly consecrated Orthodox Bishop of Durazzo. This regularises the previously somewhat dubious right of the latter's title. It is the first consecration of a Bishop by the Autocephalous Church of Albania, which has now three Bishops. A second congress is to be held next April or May to decide on the final constitution of the Church. The provisional decision of the first congress to form five dioceses will probably be reversed, three or, at the most, four, being considered sufficient.

MACEDONIA.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—We welcome the attention which has been drawn in the columns of THE NEAR EAST to the very grave and urgent question of the Macedonian minorities. Reliable information indicates that a veritable reign of terror exists in that portion of Macedonia included by the Treaty of Neuilly in Southern Serbia, that the persecuted inhabitants are collecting arms and ammunition, and in some cases are taking refuge across the Bulgarian frontier.

The contention that the people of Macedonia are really Serbs cannot be taken seriously; and we fear that unless the Yugoslav Government can be persuaded to carry out its Treaty obligations in regard to the rights of minorities, a war of extermination is inevitable in the near future, which may lead to a more or less general conflagration in the Balkans.

We would urge, therefore, that at the earliest possible moment the status and claims of the Macedonians should be considered by the League of Nations.—We are, etc.,

THE BAGHDAD RAILWAY.

"TURKEY, THE GREAT POWERS AND THE BAGDAD RAILWAY." By Edward Mead Earle, Ph.D. (New York: The Macmillan Company

The story of the Baghdad Railway provides the most absorbing political romance in Near Eastern history. It loses nothing in being told with the detachment that Professor Earle brings to bear upon his subject. His dispassionate narrative, enlivened occasionally by a caustic remark at the expense of one or other of his dramatis personæ, represents an amazingly comprehensive study of the literature that has grown up round the Railway, and the value of the book is enhanced by the copious references that it contains.

Few will disagree with Professor Earle's contention that it was one of the tragedies of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries that the Baghdad Railway, together with the Suez Canal and the Trans-Siberian Railway—"potent instruments of civilisation for the promotion of peaceful progress and material prosperity"—could not have been constructed without occasioning Imperial friction, political intrigues, military alliances, and armed conflicts. Diplomatically, however, the region traversed by the Baghdad Railway was a "danger zone." It was in 1888, with the opening of rail communication to Constantinople, that interest in railway construction in Asia Minor began to be quickened among the Turks. The British owners, or leaseholders, of the Haidar Pasha-Ismid Railway were invited to extend that line to Angora, with a view to an eventual extension to Baghdad; but they were unable to interest investors in the enterprise. An attempt was made in the same year to form an Anglo-American syndicate for the purpose, but this, too, met with no success. At this point Germany enters upon the scene. A German syndicate took over the Haidar Pasha-Ismid line, was awarded a concession for a railway to Angora, and became the Anatolian Railway Company. By 1893 the railway had reached Angora; by 1896 Konia; two years later the Emperor William II. made his spectacular tour to Palestine, and within a few months the route of the Baghdad Railway was fixed by a German Commission. By this time both Great Britain and France had accustomed themselves to the idea of Germany's being responsible for the construction of a railway to Baghdad; for France it was no small recommendation that the Imperial Ottoman Bank was to be given a substantial participation in the proposed Baghdad Railway Company. When the award of the concession was finally made in March, 1902, to the Anatolian Railway Company there was no indication that any determined resistance would be made to the consummation of the plans for the construction of the Baghdad Railway. "The chief difficulties of the concessionaires seemed to be not political, but financial and administrative." A revised convention became necessary, and was executed in March, 1903, when a new Baghdad Railway Company was incorporated under Turkish law, with a capital of 15,000,000 francs, of which the Anatolian Railway Company subscribed 10 per cent. Of the eleven members of the board of directors, three were to be appointed by the latter company and at least three others had to be Ottoman subjects. The Turkish Government undertook partially to finance the construction of the railway by issuing to the company for each kilometre of the line built the sum of 275,000 francs, nominal value, in Imperial Ottoman Bonds, and guaranteed gross operating receipts of 4,500 francs annually for each kilometre of the line open to traffic. Almost immediately an invitation was extended to British capitalists to participate in the enterprise, and an agreement was reached by which British capital was to share equally in ownership and control with the German and the French; "but the hostile attitude of the English Press and the disapproval of the Balfour Government led to the abandonment of the proposed tripartite syndicate." At the outset the Baghdad Railway had been looked upon merely as a financial undertaking, and its pros and cons had been considered from the point of view of a business enterprise. It was destined, however, soon to overstep the bounds of purely economic interest and to enter the arena of international diplomacy. Professor Earle explains at length the genesis of the political opposition. As far as Great Britain was concerned, there had actually been negotiations between the Government and German financiers in April, 1903, when, according to our author, the latter were assured that no diplomatic obstacles would be offered by Great Britain to the construction of the railway; but in the same month Mr. Balfour, after a bitter campaign had been carried on in the Press, announced in the House of Commons that the Government was determined to withdraw all support, financial and otherwise, which Great Britain might be in a position to lend the Baghdad Railway. "As events turned out, the failure of the Balfour Government to effect the internationalisation of the Baghdad Railway was a colossal diplomatic blunder. If the proposed agreement of 1903 had been consummated, the entente of 1904 between France and England would have taken control of the enterprise out of the hands of the Germans, who would have possessed, with their Turkish collaborators, only fourteen of the thirty votes on the board of directors."

In spite of a rapid start—the line from Konia to Bulgarlu, a distance of 200 kilometres, was opened to traffic in October, 1904—the affairs of the Baghdad Railway progressed slowly. From 1904 to 1909 the company marked time. The Young Turk Revolution found Turkey anxious to sit at the feet of Great Britain; but the opportunity was neglected, in the author's opinion, mainly owing to the British distrust of the Baghdad Railway. Negotiations between Turkey and Great Britain, on the initiative of the former, took place during 1910 and 1911, the Turkish proposal being that the Baghdad-Basra section of the railway should be constructed by an Ottoman company, to the capital of which the Turkish Government should subscribe 40 per cent., and German, French, and British capitalists 20 per cent. each. A quid pro quo was that the Powers should agree to an increase in the Turkish customs duties, but to this Sir Edward Grey would not consent, "because it was not clear that the Ottoman Government was ready to guarantee adequate protection to British commercial interests in Mesopotamia and the region of the Persian Gulf." Prior to this the Potsdam Agreement of November, 1910, had obtained from Russia the withdrawal of all diplomatic opposition to the construction of the line to Baghdad and to the participation of foreign capital therein. Negotiations between Turkey and Great Britain were resumed in July, 1911, but were interrupted by the Agadir crisis and Turkey's war in Tripoli. They were resumed in 1913, when agreement was reached on a number of questions affecting the two countries in the Middle East. By the terms of one Treaty the terminus of the Baghdad Railway was to be Basrah, unless and until Great Britain should give her consent to an extension of the line to the Persian Gulf. On February 15, 1914, was signed a secret Franco-German convention, hitherto unpublished, the terms of which are now revealed by Professor Earle. Finally, the Anglo-German Convention of June 15, 1914, "constituted a complete settlement of the controversy which had waged for more than ten years over German railway construction in the Mesopotamian Valley."

The rest of the story is recent history. All German rights in the Baghdad Railway were abrogated by the Treaty of Versailles. France, by the Angora Treaty, sought to make herself heir to the former German estate in Asiatic Turkey, but in the absence of ratification of this Treaty by the Angora Assembly the French title to certain sections of the Baghdad Railway would become invalid. On May 15, 1923, it was announced that a syndicate of British banks had purchased a controlling interest in the Bank für Orientalischen Eisenbahnen, of Zurich, the Deutsche Bank's holding company for the Anatolian and Baghdad Railway Companies. Writing in June last, Professor Earle declares:—

> Thus, after twenty years of diplomatic bargaining, British Imperialists had won possession of the "short cut to India." Should Great Britain succeed in establishing her point that the Bank für Orientalischen Eisenbahnen is a neutral Swiss, rather than enemy German, corporation, and therefore exempt from seizure under the reparations provisions of the Treaty of Versailles; and should the Chester concessions be recognised as superseding the rights of the Black Sea Railways, French interests in the Levant will face a powerful Anglo-American competition which it will be very difficult for them to combat with any degree of success.

The end, however, is not yet. The Baghdad Railway has reached Nisibin, the question of an extension, as well as the Chester Concessions, is in the air. With reference to the latter our author, regarding them as a fait accompli, has many things to say. They "may be either promise or menace. . . . They will be a menace—to Turkey, to the United States, and to the peace of the world—if, unhappily, they should lead Republican America in the footsteps of Imperial Germany."

The book is a valuable contribution to the proper understanding of an important chapter in the history of the last three decades.

MACEDONIA.

Under the auspices of the Near and Middle East Association a meeting was held, by the courtesy of Lord Lamington, at 26, Wilton Crescent, on January 25. The subject discussed at this meeting was "Macedonia," and the principal speakers were Mlle. Stancioff, Brig.-Gen. C. B. Thomson, and Lady Grogan, Lord Edward Gleichen being in the chair.

Mlle. Stancioff dealt for the most part with the Bulgarian point of view, and the substance of her speech is reprinted on another page of this issue.

The new Secretary of State for Air began by saying that he first got an insight into the Macedonian question during the Balkan War of 1912, which he saw as British Military Attaché. Following in the wake of the Serbs, the Bulgars, and the Greeks, he passed through a great part of Macedonia, and easily satisfied himself that it was mainly Bulgarian. This fact he proved by illuminating and often humorous anecdote. He then proceeded to examine the present organisations in Macedonia which are striving to gain for Bulgaria what he called the elementary rights of citizenship, and divided them into two—the "Brotherhood" movement, which was very widely spread and was strongest in Bulgaria itself, and the revolutionary movement of Todor Alexandroff. With the first, he said, no reasonable person could fail to sympathise; and from the second also he could not withhold admiration. Alexandroff's komitaji bands were an extraordinary institution; their writ was wide and unquestioned, they administered justice and they collected taxes. But whether Alexandroff could ever effect anything by force was doubtful. The solution of the Macedonian problem he believed to lie in an autonomous Macedonia within a federalised Yugoslavia. This could not come about immediately, for there were as yet too many die-hards at Belgrade, but a saner spirit was coming over Yugoslavia, which saw that a discontented Macedonia was rather a source of weakness than of strength. That autonomy would ultimately be granted to Macedonia was his earnest hope, if not his firm conviction.

Lady Grogan underlined the fact that it was incorrect to speak of Bulgarian minorities in Macedonia, for the Bulgars were the majority. The supposition that Macedonia was in truth Southern Serbia was ridiculed, and she quoted evidence showing that in certain parts of Southern Serbia hardly a Serb could be found. How the question could ever be solved it was difficult to see, but the spirit of the Macedonians would not die. In conclusion, she quoted a remarkable speech, written by the late Mr. J. D. Bourchier five days before his death, to the Macedonians, in which he assured them that justice would ultimately descend upon them.

In the subsequent discussion Miss Edith Durham, Mrs. Hasluck, Sir Edward Boyle, and Mr. Charles Woods took part.

The following, among others were present:—Aziz Izzet Pasha (Egyptian Minister), M. Stancioff (Bulgarian Minister) and Mme. Stancioff, Mohamed Safdar Khan (representing the Afghan Minister), the Prince and Princess Soumbatoff, the Lady Helena Gleichen, the Viscountess Dupplin, Lord Raglan, Admiral Sir Frederick Fisher, Admiral Tryon, the Dowager Lady Boyle, Sir Edward Boyle, Lady Leslie, Sir Henry and Lady Sharp, Mrs. Cunliffe, Sir William O. Clark, M. Braunl (Austrian Attaché), Mr. and Mrs. Leland Buxton, M. Felix Valyi, Mrs. L. Cobham, Miss Vaughan Morgan, Miss Edith Durham, Professor Arnold Toynbee, Mr. and Mrs. Bruce Dick, Mrs. Margaret Hasluck, Major H. Bettelheim, and Captain Lyon-Thomson.

Mr. Morgenthau's Relief Committee has issued an appeal for assistance, especially in clothing and blankets, for the refugees in Western Thrace and Macedonia, where mortality from the cold is very high, amounting in Salonika alone to ten in a single day.

According to the Morning Post Athens correspondent, 625,000 drachmas is to be devoted to regulating the bed of the River Kladeos at Olympia, so as to prevent inundations likely to damage the adjacent museum, containing the famous "Hermes" of Praxiteles.

The Convention between the principal Allied Powers relative to the assessment and reparation of damage suffered in Turkey by the nationals of the contracting Powers is now published as a White Paper (Treaty Series No. 3, 1924, 3d. net). The White Paper also includes the Protocol providing for signature by Roumania.

By the King's command, the usual anniversary sermon on the death of General Charles Gordon, which was first instituted by the late King Edward in 1890, was preached on January 23 by the Rev. A. Rowland Grant, Domestic Chaplain to the King and Hon. Domestic Chaplain to Queen Alexandra. The offertory at the close of the service, which amounted to £235, was given to the Gordon Boys' Home.

THE AMMAN CONFERENCE.

The eddies caused by the dropping of the stone of the Amman Conference into the somewhat stagnant waters of Eastern politics will, we imagine, be almost imperceptible by the time that they have reached the present British Government. Our Labour Government, moreover, will have too many kettles already loaded to want to fish in such weedy pools. But there is no mistaking the splash that the visit of King Hussein to the capital of his son, the Emir Abdullah, has made in Western Asia. One would think, if one believed the rumours that come to these shores on its ripples, that the future of the Moslem religion and of the whole of the Arab lands were at stake. We do not doubt, however, that this visit is, in the main, a personal one, and that all this talk of the Khalifate, the Arab Confederation, and so on, is the result of reading into the conference far more than the facts will permit. It has been stated, indeed, that King Hussein has repudiated the charge made against him in various quarters that he wished to proclaim himself Khalif, and our interpretation of his conduct since the War suggests rather that he is concentrating on the political unity of the lands under his tutelage or under the tutelage of his sons. That he is discussing with the Arab chiefs now assembled in Trans-Jordania the possibilities of Arab unity is certain; but that is his affair, not that of the British. It may be taken for granted that Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's Government, even more carefully than any previous Government, will refrain from involving itself in any possible dispute as between Arabia and Turkey, or in the question of the Khalifate. Whatever is done in the immediate future for the cause of Arab unity or against the enemies of the Arabs will be done by Arabs.

There is, however, one aspect of this Amman Conference which closely touches Britain, and that is its relation to Palestine. Almost all the parties of Arab Palestine, formed, deformed, or in the forming, seem to have crossed the Jordan and to have poured out their woes to His Hashimite Majesty at Amman. The trouble arises from the indeterminate position of Palestine vis-à-vis the Arab Confederation. King Hussein appears to have acted wisely in this connection in pointing out to certain Arab extremists the wild impossibility of their views, but it is highly regrettable that the newly-formed National Party and the Peasant Party should have been allowed to depart from Amman so unsatisfied. These two parties are the most promising feature that has appeared in Palestine's political life for a long time, and it speaks poorly for the claim of the Congress Party to represent all the Arabs that these two parties should not have been allowed a fair hearing. From the point of view of the Confederation Palestine is, admittedly, an anomaly, and many Arabs, realising this, would prefer that Palestine should be excluded altogether from the Anglo-Hejazi Treaty to its being included on terms which necessitated recognition of the Balfour Declaration. It may be remarked here that there is no possible chance of the present British Government repudiating the Declaration, and that to encourage any other hopes in Arab breasts is both foolish and a waste of time. So long as France and Britain pursue their present policies in Western Asia—and there is no sign of any break in the continuity—the Arabs of Syria and Palestine are beating the air in trying to bring the Mediterranean into their scheme of things. Our present Premier and Foreign Secretary is every whit as much an admirer of the Zionist policy as was Mr. Lloyd George.

To the problems of the Arab Confederation this country will now take up the attitude of an interested but quite impartial spectator. She sees clearly the difficulties ahead of such a Confederation. Parts are outstripping the whole, and it would seem that the Arabs in favour of a Confederation have yet to learn that a chain is as strong as its weakest link, which, being interpreted, means that the Arabian chain is as strong as the Hejaz, and no stronger. From information that has reached us, not only from Arabia, but from the plains of India, it would appear that the Hejaz is not at this moment the happiest place in which to live; particularly, the pilgrims are not cared for as they should be. Compared with such a country as Irak, for example, or even Nejd, which seems genuinely anxious to secure stability and quiet, the Hejaz has much leeway to make up before it can fitly claim to lead the Arabian Peninsula. King Hussein has not himself sent representatives to the Conference, which is now sitting at Koweit under Colonel Knox, but it should not be supposed from this fact that the frontiers of the Hejaz are in the securest condition. Ibn Saud finds it hard to restrain his warlike tribes on the outskirts of his country, and certainly King Hussein finds it just as hard to repel them. It would seem, therefore, that King Hussein might with more advantage to himself and to the cause of Arab unity look rather inward to his own kingdom than outward to a sketchy empire. The price due to his family for the services which they rendered to the Allied cause in the War has surely now been paid, although if the Arabs can compose their differences Britain will look on with gratified eyes. But any steps to assist in the proclaiming of King Hussein Khalif of the Faithful this country will definitely refuse to take. It is not, moreover, obvious what advantages such a unity has to offer to any but the more backward of the Arab States. These new States are now perfectly free from interruption from Turkey, who has finally acquiesced in the loss of her provinces, and they can quite safely concentrate on internal progress, instead of seeking friends abroad. It is, in short, the duty of such States as the Hejaz to try to approach the level of Irak rather than to seek to bring other States down to the level of itself.

THE PROBLEMS OF BULGARIA.

By NADEJDA STANCIOFF.

We append below the substance of an address delivered by Miss Nadejda Stancioff at a meeting of the Near and Middle East Association on January 25, a report of which is included elsewhere in this issue.—ED.

During the last six months Bulgaria has been through severe trials. The spirit of unrest which pervades the whole of Europe cannot but meet with a favourable atmosphere throughout the Balkans at one of the most critical periods of the history of that troubled region.

On June 9 Bulgaria was shaken by a bloodless revolution which brought about with almost incredible swiftness the overthrow of the Agrarian Government. The immediate causes of this fall are well known: Under Stambolisky's leadership the Agrarian Party became a great force in the country; but he subjected the Agrarian political machine to a strain far exceeding its power of endurance. Many reasons, which do not all belong to the realm of domestic politics, explain the rapid and complete success of the coup of June 9 organised by representatives of the Bulgarian intelligenzia and the army, constituting a group which may be rightly compared to the Fascisti. The Government which has since presided over the destinies of Bulgaria is drawn from the so-called bourgeois parties, and has at its head Professor Zankoff, whose reputation is that of a capable man solely inspired by patriotic motives. He is ably seconded by his Ministers and, in particular, by the Foreign Secretary, M. Kalfoff, who was recently received in Paris, London, and Rome by the Allied Governments. The intentions of this Bulgarian Government are perfectly sound; it has already shown that it proposes to continue Stambolisky's foreign policy and to preserve order in the country. The strength of this Government seems to have been proved by two outstanding events: the reverse sustained by the Communists in Bulgaria after their outbreak of last September, and the result of the elections in November, which granted to the Government a majority of over 180 seats.

Since June 9 last the present Bulgarian Government has administered the country wisely, and has overcome several difficulties, the principal being the very serious insurrections to which I have just referred, which it managed to suppress in spite of most inadequate means, the present Bulgarian army numbering in all less than 18,000 men. This question is a source of great anxiety to the Bulgarian Government, the difficulty being that the system of recruiting the army in Bulgaria, prescribed by the Treaty of Neuilly, is that of voluntary enlistment, as opposed to the previous one of compulsory service still existent in the neighbouring Balkan countries. In virtue of the Treaty, Bulgaria is entitled to an army of 33,000 men. The Government, in spite of innumerable and varied efforts, has not found it possible to attain this insignificant total by means of voluntary enlistment, for economic and social reasons peculiar to Bulgaria, where unemployment is practically unknown and the peasants are reluctant to abandon their farms and lands for a fixed period of twelve years' conscription. After the last outbreak, the Bulgarian Government renews its demand, already made in Paris during the Conference, that it should be authorised to recruit one-third of the Bulgarian army (one-third of 33,000 men) by compulsory service for a limited period, another important reason being that voluntary enlistment imposes upon the country financial charges far exceeding its resources.

Apart from this difficulty, M. Zankoff's Cabinet is faced by several outstanding complications abroad, the two problems of importance being the imperious necessity for Bulgaria of obtaining a free outlet to the Ægean Sea and the Macedonian question.

The question of the Bulgarian outlet may be summarised as follows:—In virtue of Article 48 of the Treaty of Neuilly, Bulgaria surrendered Western Thrace—namely, the territory between the Maritza, the Mesta, and the Ægean Sea—to the principal Allied and Associated Powers. But, as is well known, the same article formally and categorically guarantees to Bulgaria a free outlet to the Ægean Sea, stipulating "the conditions to be fixed at a later date"; five years have passed since and Bulgaria has no outlet whatsoever! After the Armistice, Western Thrace was occupied by French troops under the command of General Charpy, whose excellent and just administration contented the whole of the population—Bulgarians and Turks alike.

These happy days were not to last long. In virtue of the Conference of San Remo and the Treaty of Sèvres, the Allies gave Greece the jurisdiction of Western Thrace, thus interposing a hostile country between Bulgaria and the Ægean Sea, and considerably adding to the crushing burden of the Treaty of Neuilly. Then event followed upon event. The crushing defeat sustained by the Greek troops in Asia Minor dealt a mortal blow to the Treaty of Sèvres, which was definitely torn into shreds at the Lausanne Conference last year, with the exception, so to speak, of one page—the clause relating to the Bulgarian outlet! Bulgaria was, in truth, admitted to this Conference that was supposed to find a just settlement for all the thorny questions of the Near and Middle East, and she was given a fair hearing owing in great part to British influence; but, unlike Turkey, Bulgaria had not the means of supporting her arguments by the strength of her armies and her geographical position. Once again Bulgaria failed to receive her due. With regard to a just settlement of Article 48 of the Treaty of Neuilly, the Allies had two solutions at hand:—

1. Convert Western Thrace into an autonomous territory, with an international administration under the control of the League of Nations; or

2. Grant to Bulgaria a so-called corridor or strip of territory on both banks of the River Maritza between the Bulgarian frontier and the port of Dedeagatch, with full control over the railway between Kouleli Bourgas and Dedeagatch and full sovereignty over Dedeagatch itself. This second solution would have been the most logical; for, since Eastern Thrace has been taken over by the Turks, Western Thrace is no longer of any necessity to the Greeks already endowed by nature with more ports than this country can possibly use.

However, at Lausanne the Allied delegates failed to choose either of these two solutions, and limited themselves to the following curious compromise: they offered Bulgaria a strip of territory of three square kilometres on the Ægean coast for the purpose of building a port, suited to modern requirements. This offer was subjected to the creation of an International Commission to control the "exploitation" of the port and of the railway—this last to remain in Greek territory and to retain its Greek officials. It is easy to understand why Bulgaria was obliged in her own interest to refuse this very inadequate settlement of a question which is of vital importance to the country. To begin with, how and where could the Bulgarian Government have found, in these circumstances, the necessary capital for the construction of a port suited to modern requirements.

For Bulgaria the free access to and the full control of a port on the Ægean Sea are an absolute necessity.

Since the War the economic force of a country dominates all others; in order to prosper and to recuperate Bulgaria must increase her production and develop her trade. A glance at the map will demonstrate the impractical nature of the present settlement, which places in the hands of the Greeks the control of the entire seaboard of the Ægean and enables them to thwart at will the economic expansion of Bulgaria. The two Bulgarian ports on the Black Sea offer only an indirect route, which, in time of trouble, may yet be closed to Bulgaria in spite of the Treaty of Lausanne; moreover, this route entails greater expenses and a much longer voyage. The question of Bulgaria's outlet to the Ægean remains open—a fact which seems almost incredible, in face of Article 48 of the Treaty of Neuilly duly ratified by all the Allied and Associated Powers—a Treaty now several years old! It is curious that the one and only obligation assumed by the Allies in that Treaty towards Bulgaria should not have been fulfilled—the while Bulgaria has loyally discharged all her own.

The second great problem confronting the present Bulgarian Government, is, as I have said, the Macedonian question. Macedonia—the crux of the difficulty as regards the peace and stability of the Balkans! And why? Because the authors of the Treaties of Versailles, Neuilly, and Trianon were faced with an impossible task when they endeavoured, in the name of self-determination, so to alter the existing frontiers of Europe that each nation—old or new—should be free from alien control, and at the same time free from alien minorities within its jurisdiction.

As regards Macedonia, the Treaty of Neuilly has completely disregarded the Macedonian problem. Nevertheless, no dash of a pen across a written page, no dab of colour on a map, no pompous public statement, could ever obliterate this question: because the population inhabiting Macedonia will never rest till they are granted an administration corresponding to their feelings and supported by their will. Macedonia is to the surrounding States, Serbia and Bulgaria alike, a source of grave anxiety, which, if not settled, might once more render all order of things in the Balkans most dangerous. A just settlement in no way implies a revision of signed and ratified treaties, and it is, therefore, difficult to understand the excitement which, according to the Press, recently upset official quarters in Belgrade, following the last speech of the Bulgarian Prime Minister, M. Zankoff. What is there in this speech at which any neighbouring country can reasonably take offence? M. Zankoff's statement falls exactly within the limits of Bulgarian rights as laid down by the treaties of peace themselves.

For instance, when M. Zankoff asks that the rights of minorities in Macedonia be recognised, he is claiming no more than the fulfilment of the special treaty signed by Yugoslavia and the Allied Powers guaranteeing these rights. The Treaty entitled the minorities to the free use of their religion and language and guarantees their free cultural development. The Yugoslav Government denies the Bulgarian character of the Macedonian minorities. I need not reply to this allegation before the members of the Near and Middle East Association and of the Balkan Committee whom I have the honour of seeing here to-night, and who know Macedonia far better than I do and can testify to the Bulgarian character of these same minorities.

Moreover, the Bulgarian character of Macedonia is established by a long series of proofs and of documents, to which it would be impossible materially for me to refer here. Numerous travellers, ethnographers, and philologists have recognised the Bulgarian Macedonia. Nevertheless, the Bulgarian Government, faithful to the obligations of the Treaty, claim nothing more for Macedonia than that the Bulgarian minorities be treated according to the clauses of the special Treaty already mentioned; therefore, the case is not desperate. Indeed, at first, there appears to be a sharp conflict of interests in the rendering of justice to Macedonia and the maintenance of friendly relations with Yugoslavia. But, in point of fact, the Macedonian question need not necessarily remain a bone of contention between the two neighbouring countries. I may, perhaps, be allowed to quote the following from M. Zankoff's much-discussed speech:—

"The Bulgarian Government sincerely desires the most friendly relations with our neighbours. This sentiment, however, I regret to state, is not meeting with reciprocity. Yet we hope that the Serbian statesmen have, like ourselves, learned the lesson of recent events, and that they realise the necessity for discontinuing the feud between the two nations. Macedonia, once an apple of discord, could become a bond between the two countries, if the rights of its inhabitants were duly respected. In any case, there are no more war-mongers in Bulgaria. Bulgaria will never go against the vital interests of Serbia. We ask for one thing only: that the lawful rights of Bulgaria be respected."

At the present moment Macedonia is one of the worst danger spots on the map of Europe. But it is up to the Serbs, and not to the Bulgarians, to alleviate this danger. Bulgaria is tired of wars and strife, and the population is fully determined to remain at peace. It seems that it is not to the weakened Bulgaria that should be addressed objurgations to remain pacific, but rather to her strong neighbours.

The system of subjecting an alien region by respecting the rights of minorities should be recommended by the Allies to these neighbours of Bulgaria as preferable to the method of forcible denationalisation, which must eventually lead to further complications in the Balkans.

On their side, the Yugoslav Government should realise the fact that if the Yugoslav Government cannot keep their nationals within their own borders, and if a section of these nationals cross over to a neighbouring country complaining of the ill-treatment and hardship from which they have fled, this proves that the Macedonian question not only exists, but remains a gaping wound, for which a remedy must be found. Moreover, the remedy must be administered by Yugoslavia itself—namely, the Yugoslav Government would have to make their "Southern Serbia," as they choose to call it, as contented as Northern Serbia, if they wish to avoid the so-called Macedonian complications. To quote the editor of a well-known British paper: "The time has come to eradicate this cancer from the Balkans. It can be done by facing facts and exercising goodwill; it will never be done by quibbling or by trusting to brute force."

I pass now to the financial problems of Bulgaria.

It must not be overlooked that Bulgaria is, at present, the only country which is paying reparations, and her attitude in this respect is in sharp contrast to that of other countries in Europe which do not pay any reparations, and have, on the contrary, applied for financial support. The Government is endeavouring to acquire the amount necessary to meet the next instalment, which will fall due in April, 1924. Bulgaria has also carried out conscientiously all reparations in kind she had to deliver by virtue of the Treaty. Bulgaria has met her pre-War debts.

As for the general economic situation, Bulgaria this year has had a fairly good crop. The tobacco crop was particularly good this year; its yield is double that of last year, and very nearly three times that of 1921. Being an agricultural country, Bulgaria soon succeeded in eliminating the adverse effects of the War. The Budget is very nearly in equilibrium, and though in next year's Budget it will be necessary to include some supplementary expenditure items in order to satisfy the just claims of public servants, the deficit will be covered by internal resources without inflation. The best barometer of the Bulgarian economic situation is the leva exchange rate, which was recently almost al pare with the Serbian dinar, although Serbia receives reparations, while Bulgaria pays them, and, unlike Serbia, my country did not contract any external debts after the War.

There are wide possibilities for foreign investors in Bulgaria to develop the country's mineral resources, and to establish new branches of industries. The Government is desirous of securing the co-operation of foreign capital. The only branch in which British and American capital has taken considerable interest after the War is tobacco production. Owing to their activity, it is becoming possible for Bulgaria to eliminate Egypt as intermediary and to get into direct contact with the purchasers concerned.

The exchange rate is a big obstacle to the re-establishment of the old trade relations between Bulgaria and Great Britain. Still, in certain branches, such as textiles, in which the quality of British products is incomparably superior to that of any other products, Bulgaria is making substantial purchases on the British market.

Bulgaria's finances are seriously affected at the present moment by the presence on Bulgarian territory of innumerable refugees, hundreds of exiles from Thrace and Macedonia—Armenians and Russians.

Bulgaria's relations with Roumania are improving daily, and may be said to have reached a very satisfactory state; the Roumanian Government seems to seek the friendship of Bulgaria, and has proved its good intentions by real facts—the rights of the Bulgarian minorities in the Dobruja are more or less respected. The re-opening of the Bulgarian school in the town of Dobritch and the publication of a Bulgarian daily paper in that same town are two definite signs of the general improvement of relations between the Bulgarian minorities and the present Roumanian administrators.

As regards the Allies, the programme of the Bulgarian Government has not changed since the Armistice. Then, as now, Bulgaria is resolved to respect all the obligations of the Treaty of Neuilly, to maintain friendly relations with the neighbouring States, to preserve order within her frontiers, and to contribute thus to the general pacification of Europe. As Bulgaria has already given many proofs of her loyalty and good will, she seems entitled both to the esteem and the help of the Allies. This encouragement has till now been rather—if I may say so—platonic, and Bulgaria is still struggling alone on the path of good intentions! It really seems that in post-War Europe a country cannot rely upon friends unless it can offer them the support of over a million rifles!

In Bulgaria we feel that Europe is to-day divided into two camps: that of the victorious nations and the satellite countries whom it would be quite correct to call the War profiteers, and that of the weaker countries still considered as pariahs. This state of affairs does not appear to be very wise, or to offer serious guarantees of peace. The greater States of Europe should realise the danger of expounding paralysing and short-sighted theories that only serve to create armies and suspicions—and which are solely inspired by mutual fear and distrust. European Ententes and agreements are necessary; but it seems that in order to be of use they should be founded on the guiding principles of the League of Nations, and not constitute poisonous weapons in the hands of one or several countries against one or several others. A restricted agreement—for instance, a Little Entente—seems somehow to imply that its members are somewhat afraid of great aims and great conceptions, and that their political field is but small and, moreover, limited by fear.

Bulgaria hopes that the Allies, and Great Britain in particular, will not refuse to intervene in favour of a just and equitable settlement of the vital problems of the Near East. The Great Powers have duties to fulfil in the Balkans, but the smaller nations cannot appeal to the Allied Governments without the mediation and help of public opinion.

By her past and present history, by the future yet to come, Bulgaria is closely related—will always be related—to all great European events. Bulgaria combines the advantages of a rich and fertile land, of innumerable agricultural and mineral resources, and the qualities of a vigorous race that has been able to overcome all the vicissitudes of the troubled and complex history of the Balkan Peninsula.

Bulgaria needs the guidance of the Western Powers, to whom she, in return, will bring the loyal co-operation of a race that has been justly called "the strongest and most industrious of all the Balkans." Bulgaria has greatly suffered, and has yet many hardships in store, but the endurance and courage of her population entitle her to believe in better days.

After a great national misfortune, a country can in truth lose a great deal, but it can recover all by hard work and perseverance.

The friends of Bulgaria may be sure that this small country of plodding workers will not fail them, for it has kept in the heart of the nation the two most precious treasures of a strong race, which are, namely, hope and faith.

The marriage of Princess Nadejda, sister of King Boris of Bulgaria, to the Duke Albert Eugene of Wurtemberg was solemnised at Coburg last Thursday.

We have received the following from the Save the Children Fund, 42, Langham Street, W.1.:—

A few weeks ago the staff of a London office elected to contribute towards the Christmas festivities of a children's hospital: the staff was that of the Save the Children Fund and the hospital the Anglo-Serbian Children's Hospital at Belgrade. This is a wonderful institution—the only children's hospital in the country, and the sole remainder of the many British hospitals which did such excellent work in Serbia during the War. With Miss Katherine S. Macphail at its head and a staff of British sisters, this hospital is famous throughout the country, and many former soldiers bring their children from distant parts in order that they may receive attention in the British hospital.

The celebrations took place on the Serbian Christmas Day. On Christmas Eve the hospital was transformed into a veritable flower garden: all entrances were decorated with sycamore branches, evergreens, and mistletoe; above each little bed hung frosted sycamore branches, which glistened delightfully; on the walls were many children's pictures, and from the ceiling were suspended big coloured lanterns, brought from England specially for the occasion. But the object of greatest admiration was the Christmas tree, which was loaded with things good for the eyes, palates, and hearts of the sick children.

On Christmas afternoon came many guests: all the officials of the English and American colony at Belgrade and many Serbian friends. When everyone was present the "Christmas Spirit" appeared. He was just like Santa Claus, for he was dressed in red clothes and had a white beard. He lighted the candles on the tree, while the little patients watched from their beds with open mouths and beating hearts at such wonderful Christmas customs. Then the "Christmas Spirit" distributed the presents, first to the patients and then to the little guests, amongst whom were some children from one of the orphanages, who came to entertain their sick friends. When the excitement was over tea was served in the dining room for the guests, sisters, and all hospital workers.

During 1923, 425 medical and 155 surgical cases were admitted to the hospital, which represented an increase of ninety over the previous year, despite the fact that for five months the number of beds was reduced to half owing to lack of funds. Seven thousand one hundred and fifteen outpatients were also given attention during the year, and sixty children sent away for convalescent treatment. This is a record of which Dr. Macphail may well be proud, but her work would have had even more far-reaching results had it been possible to maintain the whole sixty beds throughout the year. The Save the Children Fund earnestly begs all friends of Serbia to contribute as generously as possible to the work of the children's hospital, in order that the necessity to close down beds during the present year may be obviated.

THE LAST LINK WITH GORDON.

With the death at Omdurman of Pierino Agati, says the Morning Post of January 9, one of the last two surviving Europeans who were with "Chinese" Gordon when he was overwhelmed by the Mahdi at Khartoum has disappeared. There is reason to believe that Father Bonomi, who was captured on the same occasion, is still alive and ruling a missionary station in Abyssinia. Ninety-one years ago Agati was born at Pisa of a family of builders. When twenty years of age he left Italy and emigrated to Alexandria, where he joined an elder brother in business as a builder. In 1870 he established himself at Khartoum, and when Gordon was appointed Governor-General of the Sudan Agati was entrusted with the construction of many of the principal buildings at Khartoum. He had just decided to return home when the Mahdist revolt broke out, and his retreat was cut off. When Khartoum fell, and Gordon was killed, Agati's life was spared by the Mahdi, who knew his capabilities, and proposed to make use of them. He was compelled after terrible torture to become a Mohammedan, and was then entrusted with the construction of all the defences of Omdurman. He was also responsible for the construction of the Palace of the Khalifa, the Tomb of the Mahdi, and the principal mosques and residences of the Arab chiefs. In 1898, when Lord Kitchener crushed the Mahdists and captured Khartoum, Agati fell into the hands of the English. He was sent to Cairo on his way home, but the sight of modern civilisation, after many years in the Sudan, so frightened him that he begged to be allowed to return to Omdurman for the remainder of his life. As a result of his early wanderings in Central Africa Agati was able to give valuable aid to many explorers, including Burton, Speke, Rolfe, Piaggio, Gessi, and Matteucci.

NEWS IN BRIEF.

A committee has been appointed to inquire into the delays in the Civil Courts, with Mr. G. C. Rankin, a Puisne-Judge in Calcutta, as chairman.

The Government of Angora has withdrawn its ban upon the quarrying operations conducted by the contractor to the Imperial War Graves Commission on the Gallipoli Peninsula.

Correspondence posted in France for transmission by the British air line from Cairo to Baghdad must, in addition to the ordinary postage, bear air postage stamps for one franc for every 20 grammes or fraction of 20 grammes.

During gun practice with live shell from Khartoum Fort recently a rail on the Khartoum-Obeid line was struck and broken. The damage was not noticed by either the firing party or the observing aeroplane, and in consequence a goods train was derailed. No serious personal injury was caused.

For reasons of economy, the Punjab Government has decided to discontinue the historic time gun at all stations in the Punjab except where the municipalities take over the expenditure, as the military authorities consider that the guns do not serve any military purpose commensurate with the expenditure involved.

The committee of the Lord Kitchener National Memorial Fund is about to award 50 scholarships, varying in value from £50 to £200 per annum, to the sons of officers and men who have served, or who are serving, in H.M. Forces. The scholarships will be awarded to enable the selected candidates to follow an advanced course of study at a university in England, Scotland, or Wales. Application forms can be obtained from the Lord Kitchener National Memorial Fund, 34, Norfolk Street, Strand, W.C.2.

In commemoration of the thirty-ninth anniversary of the death of General Gordon, on January 26, 1885, at Khartoum, the Council of the Shaftesbury Society and Ragged School Union (by permission of His Majesty's Office of Works), following the practice of former years, on January 26 placed upon the statue in Trafalgar Square a wreath, bearing the following inscription: "An affectionate tribute from the Shaftesbury Society and Ragged School Union to the glorious memory of Charles Gordon, a Christian gentleman and generous benefactor of poor boys."

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London, W.C.2,
Tuesday Morning.

Mr. Leaf on the Outlook.

This is the period of the bank meetings, and during the past week we have had a number of very interesting addresses on the general position. At the meeting of the Westminster Bank Mr. Walter Leaf, the chairman, struck a distinctly hopeful note. He referred to the feeling of confidence with regard to the coming year, and in this connection instanced the more promising character of the reports received from the bank's branches. He pointed out, however, that the indications of improvement "are still only promises; the fulfilment is not yet." Turning to the political situation, Mr. Leaf expressed the view that it "is piquant and interesting, but for the business man not wholly unsatisfactory." He remarked that there had been enough of Government interference during the War, and expressed the view that the election has delivered the country from the danger of rash experiments in economics, such as deliberate inflation, protection, or the capital levy, probably for a good many years to come. "Government, it seems," he added, "will be in the near future a matter not of rash legislation, but of administration carried on under constant and jealous observation, and subject to short shrift if it oversteps the limits of justice and sanity." Mr. Leaf went on to refer to the feeling of uneasiness abroad, and pointed out that there has been a certain amount of selling of sterling investments to buy dollars. The rumours that a policy of inflation was to be pursued had an effect on the New York exchange from which it has not recovered, and the nervousness of investors has, of course, increased the exchange difficulty, so that to-day, as Mr. Leaf pointed out, for political and sentimental reasons, the £ sterling stands at a value in dollars considerably below its real purchasing power. One need not emphasise the unpatriotic nature of this action on the part of investors. As Mr. Leaf said, it is also foolish, and he quoted an expert opinion from America to the effect that it will be easy to lose in American investments quite as much as in any capital levy.

A Cure for Unemployment.

At the meeting of the Midland Bank Mr. McKenna dealt with the relation of monetary policy to an industrial revival. To do full justice to his lucid exposition of the subject would be impossible in the space at my disposal, and I can only briefly outline his argument, the main point of which was that the expansion of credit is an essential in the solution of the unemployment problem. He pointed out that inflation and deflation have alike to be avoided, and a middle course must be steered. Inflation means that trade will be artificially stimulated, but that prices will rise, there will be innumerable social evils, and, finally, the danger of an extremely depreciated currency. Deflation, on the other hand, would keep trade depressed, and the unemployed would be still with us. The justification for an addition to the supply of money, Mr. McKenna said, is that a greater volume of goods should be in course of production. "If more workpeople are employed more goods will be produced, and we have therefore in the movement of the figures of the unemployed one of the indications which should direct our policy." Put briefly, then, Mr. McKenna's argument is that when national output is below productive capacity money should be increased, the supply should be checked when production has reached its maximum, and money should be withdrawn on the appearance of inflationary symptoms. "If we mean to get rid of unemployment," Mr. McKenna added, "we must have more money in existence to take up the increased production; if we mean to reduce our present amount of money we shall not escape unemployment." Mr. McKenna expressed the view that the working of our credit system would be simplified if the right of note issue were again placed exclusively in the hands of the Bank of England, and in this connection he declared that the reasons that existed in 1914 for issuing currency notes instead of extending the Bank of England's right of issue have no longer any weight.

2LO in the Near East.

The potentialities of broadcasting are only beginning to be realised. Listening-in in this country is rather in the nature of a pleasant pastime. People have taken to it as they took to roller-skating, sweet-pea cultivation, cooking in paper bags, and all the other strange crazes that marked the hectic and significant years before 1914; only, unlike these things, it has come to stay. But it does not, and never will, mean to people here what it will to British subjects temporarily exiled from the Homeland. To them it will not be a pastime, but a solace, an anodyne keeping their minds fixed on the time when they, too, will be able to listen to 2LO at close quarters—and then, in all probability, they will have something else to do. It was the success in the trans-Atlantic experiments that really emphasised what can be done with broadcasting. Provided they have the requisite apparatus, there is no reason why people in Palestine, Cyprus, or far further afield should not enjoy the benefits of 2LO regularly. Only recently in Cairo a concert broadcasted by 2LO was heard perfectly clearly. Naturally, a marked demand is developing in the Near East for wireless receiving sets. So far British firms have not paid much attention to the markets in that region owing to the great demand in this country, but the British market is not what it was, and I hope that the opening afforded in the Near East will now come in for adequate attention.

The Fair and the Exhibition.

The coming months are likely to be memorable from the business man's point of view. For one thing, there are numerous indications that the worst of the trade depression has been definitely passed, and with the gradual development of more settled conditions in Europe it is not too much to hope that the later months of the year will see a very pronounced revival of commercial activity. For another, during the next few months, either in connection with the British Industries Fair or the Exhibition, or both, there will be a great number of business men from overseas in this country, the result of whose visit should be to give a very definite incentive to trade enterprise. It must be emphasised, however, that it will not be enough merely to meet them at this end. That must be merely the beginning. The good work must be followed up by a careful and sustained publicity campaign to remind our visitors and those who have not been able to come of the ways in which we can cater for the most varied requirements of the markets of the world.

Egyptian Tourist Season.

I have received from the Egyptian State Railways an interesting chart illustrating the programmes agreed upon for the current tourist season. The chart shows the cruises arranged by five tourist agencies. There are in all 25 cruises, four of the agencies being responsible for eight; while the remaining agency runs the other seventeen, this company, needless to say, being Messrs. Thos. Cook and Son, who are facile princeps in the Egyptian tourist business. One thing that the chart brings home very forcibly is that Egypt is still far from receiving her normal quota of tourists. According to all accounts, the season is going to be good; but it is not possible yet to look for seasons on the pre-War scale (even with the added attraction at Luxor). But they will come in due course.

COMMENTATOR.

CZECHO-SLOVAKIA'S SUGAR PRODUCTION.

The production of sugar in Czecho-Slovakia during October and November is stated to have amounted to 864,678 tons, of which 79,870 tons are destined for home consumption and 201,095 were exported as follows:—50,096 to England, 62,340 to Hamburg, 24,965 to Switzerland, 22,207 to Austria, 21,022 to Italy. France and Yugoslavia participated in these exports with 500 and 700 tons, and further orders from these countries are expected. Up to the end of December 9.6 million metric quintals of raw sugar were produced. The previous year 7.4 million metric quintals of sugar were produced, the production during 1923 thus showing an increase of almost 2¼ million metric quintals. As the sugar season has not yet ended, it is expected that production will reach at least 10 million metric quintals of raw sugar.

Practically all the large shipping companies will be represented at the British Empire Exhibition.

For the first nine months of last year the exports of timber from Yugoslavia amounted to 904,631,568 kilogs, of the value of 1,058,107,813 dinars.

COBALT ORES.

A new volume on cobalt ores, in the series of monographs on mineral resources, with special reference to the British Empire, issued under the direction of the Mineral Resources Committee of the Imperial Institute, has just been published by Mr. John Murray (price 3s. 6d.). It is written by Mr. Edward Halse, A.R.S.M., M.Inst.M.M., Scientific and Technical Department, Imperial Institute.

Cobalt compounds are mainly used as pigments, especially to form the blue colouring matter in the enamel, glass, and pottery industries. Although blue cobalt glass has been found in the tombs of the ancient Egyptians, and in the ruins of Troy, the metal was prepared for the first time in the eighteenth century, and has only come into industrial use in comparatively recent years. Alloys of steel and cobalt, with other metals, are used for permanent magnets in electrical instruments and in the manufacture of high-speed tools; alloys of cobalt and chromium are used in "stainless" cutlery, and, with certain other metals added, are suitable for cutting tools.

No reliable statistics of the world's production of cobalt (metal) are available, but it probably does not exceed a few hundred tons per annum. In recent years Canada has been the chief producer, the average annual production of that country during the last nine years having been a little under 300 short tons (expressed in terms of metal).

The first chapter of the monograph briefly describes the cobalt minerals, the mining, concentration, and metallurgy of the same, and the physical properties, uses, prices, and production of the metal. In the second chapter the deposits of the British Empire are described, the principal being in Cobalt, South Lorrain, Gowganda, and Casey, Ontario. Other occurrences described are those in the Transvaal, New South Wales, and Queensland (where deposits are now being actively opened up), and India. The third and last chapter describes the cobalt deposits of foreign countries, principally those of New Caledonia, Czecho-Slovakia, Germany, Scandinavia, and the United States. A brief description is given of the cobalt deposits in the Caucasus at Dash Kessan, on the east slope of the Katschkar-Tschai Valley, near Elizabetopol. These deposits were worked as long ago as 1866, and, while the output appears to have been fairly important at first, it is stated that the quantity of ore recovered in recent years has been about 15 tons per annum. A sketch map shows the chief cobalt occurrences in the world, and the volume concludes with a list of publications on cobalt.

THE RESOURCES OF TUNIS.

Port Facilities.

A very interesting review of the resources, industries, and commerce of Tunis, by Mr. James Raider Mood, has recently been issued by the United States Department of Commerce. The brochure contains a letter by Mr. Julius Klein, Director of the Department of Commerce, in which he points out that the Mediterranean region of North Africa promises to be increasingly important to international commerce within the next few years, and refers to the position of Tunis as being "at the centre of the trade routes to the Near East." We give the following extracts from the report :—

The Regency of Tunis occupies a privileged location midway of the Mediterranean trade routes, with its east coast facing toward Egypt, Syria, Asia Minor, and the Balkan Peninsula, its north coast facing France, Italy, and Spain, and its unusually strong naval port at Bizerta commanding the passage between the two maritime basins. Proximity to the interior of Africa made it also the most important caravan terminus for that region, before the railroads gave an eastward outlet to the Sudan.

Tunis may be divided into five zones. The north and north-west is characterised by mountains which are continuations of the Atlas Range in Algeria. This area is well wooded, the valleys are spacious, and the soil is often found to be exceptionally fertile, especially in the valley of the Mejerda River and on the plains of Mornag, Mateur, and Beja. The Mejerda region is enriched by valuable deposits of iron and copper ore. In the north-west zone and reaching to Cape Bon, the soil is rich and well watered; the climate, directly affected by the Mediterranean, is quite pleasant and particularly favourable to the cultivation of olives, oranges, mandarins, and citrons. The east coast zone, known as the Sahel (Arabic for "sea coast") is a fertile, fairly well-watered flat region between the Gulf of Hammamet and the Gulf of Gabes. Throughout the region are marshy districts, and the water oozing from the soil is generally brackish, in some places forming shallow salt lakes. The coast plain is preeminently a region of olive trees; but inland the country is rather wild and barren and frequently swept by the sirocco.

The central interior, a region of steppes and high plateaux stretching from the Mejerda to Gasfa, in parts is bleak and cold in winter and sirocco-swept in summer. In the parts favoured by rain, alfa and diss grow abundantly; wheat is cultivated in the northern sections and barley in the southern. As the result of past centuries of war, neglect, and denudation by roving herds of goats, trees are comparatively rare. This region is also the stock-raising district. The southern zone, although mainly desert, has celebrated oases in its northern section, where there are gardens and fruit trees, especially the date palm. This is the region characterised by numerous 'shotts" or salt-water depressions, filled with shallow water and mud during the rainy season and incrusted with salt during the dry season. The oases are sustained by perennial springs, most of them hot, and some of salt and some of fresh water. The latter are diverted to irrigation, leaving the numerous shotts to be fed by the salt springs. Along the northern stretches of these shotts and extending northward to the mountains on the Algerian border are the celebrated phosphate beds on which Europe depends so largely for its supply. South of the Jerid the country is mostly unexplored desert of shifting sand.

The French naval base of Bizerta, an exceptionally strong one, is situated at the northernmost point of Africa. Known in Roman days as Hippo Zarytus (Diarrhytus), it was originally a Tyrian colony comparable in age to Carthage. The new harbour of Bizerta comprises: A breakwater nearly 2,000 feet in length; two jetties about 3,000 and 4,000 feet in length, extending to a depth of 46 feet of water; an outer harbour, formed by these two jetties, with a superficial area of about 225 acres; a canal connecting the sea with the lake, having a depth of 30 feet, a width of 820 feet at the water line, and 656 feet at the bottom; quay walls in masonry, with 26 feet of water alongside; sheds and warehouses; railway lines on the quays in connection with the Tunisian and Algerian railways; a maritime railway station for passengers and goods; rolling steam cranes, a floating sheer-leg crane capable of lifting 25 tons; and an excellent anchorage for numerous vessels in Sebra Bay at the entrance to the lake, in 4¾ fathoms. For the purpose of loading iron ore special and costly machinery has been erected in a well-sheltered position, and ore is put on board steamers at the rate of 3,000 to 5,000 tons per day. The largest boats can be loaded, but the draught should not exceed 26 feet. There are three dry docks, two of which are 656 feet long, 90½ feet wide, and 33½ feet deep on the sill. The third is about half the size of the other two. Two new docks, aggregating a length of 985 feet, are authorised. The principal exports through the port of Bizerta are grain, beans, lead and zinc, and iron ore.

At the port of Tunis a channel has been dredged to the city from Goletta (the actual seaport) through the basin that forms the lake of Tunis (El Bahira). This channel, which is six nautical miles long, has a width of 98 feet and a depth of 22½ feet. It has a waiting and a passing station midway. Near the sea end of the channel, which is protected by two jetties, is the basin of La Goulette (Goletta) about 18 acres in extent, with a depth of 8⅓ feet and a quay 1,050 feet long. In front of the city is a basin about 30 acres in extent, with the same depth of water as the channel. In this basin are three wooden piers for landing passengers, and 1,875 feet of wharfage where steamers can load and discharge alongside. On the quays are two steam cranes capable of lifting 1½ tons and of discharging from 40 to 50 tons per hour each, besides one steam crane capable of lifting 3 tons. There is a floating steam crane capable of lifting 20 tons. Iron ore is loaded by belt conveyor up to 4,000 tons per day. There is also a small dry dock 193 feet long, 31 feet wide, and 9½ feet on the sill. The export trade through the port of Tunis-Goletta consists chiefly of phosphates, grain, beans, iron, lead, and zinc ores, wine, marble and stone, fez caps, live stock, fish, and hides.

The usual anchorage outside the port of Susa (French Sousse, on the site of ancient Hadrumetum) is in from 5 to 6 fathoms, and the depth available for vessels entering this port is about 20 feet. A breakwater runs out on the north side of the harbour. The area inside covers about 30 acres, and has a uniform depth of 21 feet. The custom-house quay is 1,800 feet long, with a depth alongside of 20 feet; it has one crane capable of lifting 10 tons. There are no tides. Exports through Susa consist mostly of grain, phosphates, alfa, olive oil, soap, and lead ore.

The roadstead off Sfax (ancient Taphrura), protected by the Kerkena Islands, is the best on the Tunisian coast, but can be approached by large vessels only from the south. There is never any sea. Steamers generally anchor about 3 miles from shore, at the entrance to the channel, in from 26 to 33 feet of water. The length of the entrance channel from roadstead to dock is 2¼ miles; the width is 118 feet at the top and 72 feet at the bottom. There are two quays, one 1,207 feet and the other 738 feet long. The depth in the entrance channel, dock, and quayside at high water is 27 feet; at low water, 21¼ feet. The dock has an area of 25 acres. There are two steam cranes of 1½ tons and a floating crane of 20 tons. The port is well supplied with good lighters and a steam tug. Important works were undertaken in 1920 to widen and deepen the channel as well as the dock, so that vessels of large tonnage will be able to call at this port. A project is under negotiation for a canal between the mainland and Kerkena Islands that will save ships a 40-mile detour. Tunisian products exported through Sfax comprise chiefly phosphates, grain, sponges, alfa and esparto goods, olive oil, dates, almonds, wool, and camels.

Tunis has several other ports of lesser importance open to international trade, such as Gabes, Mahdia, Tabarca, Monastir, Zarsis, Houmt Souk (Jerba), Hammamet, Nabeul, and Porto Farina. These ports were established at the expense of the State, while Bizerta, Tunis, Sfax, and Susa were built partly by the State and partly by private companies receiving concessions from the Tunisian Government. The net profits for 1922 of the Compagnie des Ports de Tunis, Sousse et Sfax amounted to 1,095,808 francs, an increase of 400,000 over 1921.

Agriculture.

The principal industry of Tunis is agriculture, and large farms of 600 to 750 acres predominate. There were, in 1921 (the latest data available), 7,925,000 acres of arable land and 2.740,000 acres of forests. Over 3,000,000 acres were devoted to cereals and vegetables; about 58,000 acres to vineyards; about 420,000 acres to olive trees; and about 47,000 acres to date palms. The richest farming region is along the north-west coast, where soil is exceptionally fertile and rainfall abundant. Effective drainage is the present need in that section, and more widespread water storage and irrigation for the more arid regions further south.

Modern agricultural implements and machinery have been quite extensively adopted by owners of large farms (chiefly French, Italians, and some progressive Arabs). Most of the ordinary classes of implements are in use, and about 600 tractors have been introduced; but good mechanics for their servicing are scarce.

The most important cereal is wheat, a product for which Tunis was noted as far back as the time of the ancient Romans. In fact, Tunis was called the granary of Rome, and Pliny mentions the hard wheat of Northern Africa as among the best. Wheat is cultivated on the plains and the hills along the Mejerda River, on the plateaux, and in some of the oases. About 1,400,000 acres were sown to hard wheat during 1921; although the crop was injured somewhat by plant diseases that were encouraged by the weather, it was above the average and produced 255,000 metric tons.

Next in importance to wheat is barley. Its cultivation is particularly advantageous on the high plateaux and on the highlands in the north-east and east. The variety grown in Tunis is known as winter barley, and is common to the entire northern part of Africa. That grown in the northern regions and in the valley of the Mejerda is often yellow, but is good for food, and serves very well for feeding cattle; that cultivated on the high plateaux and on the highlands in the east and ripened in a dry atmosphere is quite white, and is excellent for brewing purposes. As barley grows better than wheat in the dry soil, it can be sown before the rainy season begins and be harvested in time for wheat to be sown and mature on the same ground; this double cropping is very frequently practised by the natives. The barley crop in Tunis is always seriously menaced by sparrows, which attack the grain when it is in milk; if the fields are not well guarded at this time, the crop is often completely destroyed. The barley harvest varies, the production in 1912 being 67,000 metric tons, and in 1915 230,000 tons; the mean annual production during the period 1910-1919 was 160,000 tons. The area under cultivation in 1921 was about 1,228,000 acres, and the production 250,000 metric tons. The annual exportation averages approximately 52,000 metric tons.

(To be concluded.)

BRITISH SAMPLE ROOM AT TEHERAN.

The Department of Overseas Trade is informed that, with a view to promoting and developing British trade in Persia, it is proposed to establish in Teheran a sample depôt for British-made goods. Trade catalogues will be shown.

The organisers, the Société Bakhtar, who are already established in the Teheran bazaar, consider that the principal lines suitable for the Persian market are:—Cotton, woollen, silk, artificial silk, alpaca, and mohair piece-goods; velvet, velveteen, plush; stockings in cotton and artificial silk; underwear; braces, garters, elastic webs and fabrics, hides, buttons, shoes, embroideries, toilet articles, razors, scissors, mercerised yarn (for knitting), sewing yarn, blankets, linen piece-goods, shearing machines, knitting machines, spinning machines, spare parts, tyres and tubes for light cars and bicycles. The premises would consist of three rooms, fitted with show-cases and shelves, situated in a well-known serai in the bazaar in Teheran.

Mr. Hadow, the secretary in charge of commercial affairs at Teheran, gives it as his opinion that it is desirable to introduce British goods into Persia through the intermediary of Persians themselves. Persians are not inclined to order goods they have not seen, but merchants in the bazaar are perfectly willing to place orders for goods once they have inspected samples. Mr. Hadow considers some medium for increasing British trade in Teheran by displays of actual goods is much needed at the present time. No definite idea of the cost of participation to individual firms can be given at present, as this should largely depend on the number of United Kingdom firms taking part in the scheme.

At the annual general meeting of the Federation of British Industries Sir Eric Geddes was re-elected to the presidency of the Federation.

A Reuter message from Jerusalem states that it is learned from official sources in Amman that King Hussein has ordered from the Continental market fifteen locomotives and 100 cars for the Hedjaz railway.

Palestine's imports for the three months ended September 30 amounted in value to £E1,077,777, while the exports were valued at £E411,552. The totals for the corresponding periods of the previous year were £E1,251,713 and £E289,898.

LONDON PRODUCE REPORT.

Sugar Still Rising.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday Morning.

Sugar.—Home refined has continued in good request. Tate's cubes are 6d. up at 64s., Lyle's granulated has been done at 61s. 4½d., at which it shows a rise of 6d., while London granulated at 61s. 1½d. is also 6d. up. Foreign descriptions have been hard. West Indian has come to business round about 65s., white Java is unchanged at 58s. 3d., while Czech granulated is 3d. up at 59s. 6d. Futures remain firm. Quotations are: March, 29s. 3d.; May, 28s. 4½d.; August 27s. 10d.

Coffee.—The market has been steady. East Indian is unchanged at 113s., Costa Rica is the same at 109s., Nairobi remains at 103s., while Santos is unaltered at 74s.

Oilseeds.—Linseed has again been variable. Indian is unchanged at 23s., while La Plata at 19s. 6d. is 10½d. up. Rapeseed has been weak, with Toria 6d. down at 19s. 9d. and real bold Ferozepore also 6d. lower at 19s. 7½d. Cottonseed has been firm. Indian has been done at 10s. 10½d., Egyptian black has come to business at 13s. 9d., at which it is 1½d. up, while Sakellarides is unchanged at 12s. 4½d.

Seed Oils.—Linseed has been very firm, and at 46s. is 2s. 6d. up. Rape oil has also been hard, crude being 1s. 6d. up at 47s., while technical refined has gained 2s. at 50s. Cotton oil has been firm. Refined common edible has advanced 6d. to 49s., Egyptian crude is 6d. up at 44s., while deodorised at 51s. is 6d. up.

Oilcakes.—The market has been firm. Linseed cake is unchanged at 280s., coconut cake remains at 195s., while cottonseed cake is unaltered at 175s.

Dried Fruit.—A good tone has prevailed in the market. Currants have been a specially firm spot, and there seems every probability that higher prices will rule in the near future. The supply of several varieties of sultanas is limited, and while business has been on a rather restricted scale, the market remains very firm, and, as a matter of fact, prices have advanced. Plums have again moved off very freely, while there has been quite a good demand for dates.

Green Fruit.—Oranges have continued to be a good spot, and from now onwards for a few weeks the demand is likely to increase. Quotations are: Valencias, boxes (240's to 504's), 9s. 6d. to 22s. 6d.; Jaffas (144's to 152's), 16s. 6d. to 17s. 6d. Lemons have been in fair request. Quotations are:—Cases (300's), 15s. to 18s. 6d.; boxes (300's), 10s. 6d. to 13s. 6d.

The Egyptian Government is ordering from the Mint new nickel five and ten millieme coins to the value of £E30,000 and £E20,000 respectively.

The 25-ton overhead cranes which, besides being exhibits, are to unload goods for the Palace of Engineering at the British Empire Exhibition, have been placed in position.

CONDITION OF EGYPTIAN CROPS.

The bulletin of the Egyptian Ministry of Agriculture gives the following particulars of crop conditions in December:—

Millet (Nîli).—Harvesting and thrashing are in progress. Whole fields were flooded by the unusually heavy rains which fell in Aswân Province during the period under review, but the cobs were sufficiently mature to escape damage. The yield is slightly below normal.

Maize (Nîli).—Harvesting the crop is practically over. Drying and storing are in progress. The yield is below normal.

Rice (Nîli).—Harvesting is finished. Threshing and storing are progressing. The crop is a little above normal.

Flax.—Satisfactory germination and growth are reported, except in a few late-sown fields, where rain has slightly affected the crop. In early sown localities, where instructions have been followed carefully, the condition of plants offers excellent prospects. In some cases cultivation has been carried out in a rather careless manner, and in one case seeds have failed to germinate through insufficient covering after sowing. The Ministry of Agriculture has met seed requirements for over 2,300 feddâns.

Wheat.—Weather was favourable for the time of the year. Preparation and sowing the later areas, manuring and watering the early-sown crop are the cultural operations which are being carried out. The attack of cut-worm in Upper Egypt, together with the heavy rains which fell in Qena and Aswân Provinces, have caused damage to some areas, necessitating re-sowing. The application of nitrate of soda is unusually extensive this year. Germination has been good and the crop has been favoured by the good weather.

Barley.—Weather is favourable. Sowing has been terminated and some cultivators are applying chemical manures. A slight attack of cut-worm was reported from Qena and Girga Provinces, causing slight damage. Growth is normal.

Bersîm.—Sowing was completed during the period under review, and the progress of the crop is satisfactory. The heavy rains have had a slight effect on the growth of the crop in limited areas. Slight attacks of cut-worm were reported from Qena, Girga, and Assiut, causing practically no damage. The first cut is general. Ploughing of temporary bersîm for cotton has commenced. Manuring with superphosphate is more extensive than usual.

Beans.—Flowering in early-sown fields is general. Slight attacks of broom-rape were reported from Sohâg and Tahta districts and Gîza and Gharbiya Provinces in early crops; also bean-blight from Badâri. Very early pods, grown as vegetables, are now on sale. Manuring with superphosphate has been more extensive than usual. The crop is progressing satisfactorily.

Lentils.—Sowing is over. On the whole the crop is growing satisfactorily and the early-sown is in bloom.

Onions.—Weather was, on the whole, favourable. Transplanting has practically come to an end in Middle and Upper Egypt, with the exception of Gîza Province. Growth is satisfactory.

Helba.—The main crop is in flower and formation of pods is in progress.

Sugar Cane.—Preparation of small areas for the new crop has started. The crop is in the last stage of maturity, and is being cut for consumption in the raw state. Attacks of the stem-borer and mealy-bug have slightly increased since last month, particularly in places where watering has been irregular. Sugar factories will start work about the beginning of January. Yield prospects are about normal.

The Cyprus Oil Trust states that the water difficulties encountered in No. 1 well proved more serious than was at first anticipated, but they have now been entirely overcome, and cable advice to hand from the manager states: "Well No. 1 brought into production. Good well. Strong gas. Well spouted to top of derrick three times."

ADVANCE IN IVORY PRICES.

Messrs. Hale and Sons, in their report on last week's ivory sales, state:—

The quarterly ivory sales commenced 22nd and concluded 23rd inst. They comprised 43½ tons (against 39½ tons same time last year), viz.—24 tons Zanzibar, Bombay, Mozambique, East African and Siam, 1¼ tons Abyssinian, 10¾ tons Egyptian (Alexandrian description), 5¾ tons West Coast African, ½ ton Lisbon, and ¾ ton land carriage; also ¼ ton mammoth tusks and ¼ ton walrus tusks, narwhal horns, and rhinoceros horns. Of the above quantities, 1¾ tons consisted of lots previously offered or indirect import, viz.—¼ ton East Indian, ½ ton Alexandrian, ¾ ton land carriage, and ¼ ton mammoth tusks. The following was the assortment of the East Indian description:—16¾ tons soft tusks, 1 ton hard and a few Siam, 1¼ tons billiard ball pieces, ½ ton bagatelle pieces, 1 ton ball scrivelloes, ¼ ton bagatelle scrivelloes, ¾ ton cut points for balls, ¾ ton cut points off large tusks, ¼ ton under-size and defective points, etc., ½ ton scrivelloes, and 1¼ tons cut hollows. All sold with the exception of a few ex-sale lots. There was a good attendance of buyers and a good demand throughout. All kinds were keenly competed for, with the result that there was a general rise in prices. The quantity catalogued was about 10 tons less than in October last. America and the Continent were large buyers, and the home trade bought fairly.

Zanzibar, Bombay, Mozambique, East Africa, and Siam.—Soft large and medium tusks were £5 to £10 per cwt. higher on the average, and hard advanced £4 to £8 per cwt. Billiard ball pieces were again strongly competed for, and advanced £10 to £20 per cwt., and in some instances even more, the greatest rise being on the larger sizes. Bagatelle points were rather higher. Cut points for balls and cut points off large tusks were £8 to £10 per cwt. dearer. Billiard ball scrivelloes were £10 to £20 per cwt. higher, and bagatelle scrivelloes were slightly dearer. Scrivelloes were firm. Under-size and defective points were firm to rather dearer. Cut hollows, soft were £2 to £3 per cwt. higher, and hard steady. Soft bangle tusks were £5 to £10 per cwt. dearer.

Egyptian was in rather small supply. Soft large and medium tusks were £5 to £10 per cwt. higher, and hard £4 to £8 per cwt. dearer. Billiard ball scrivelloes £10 to £20 per cwt. higher. Scrivelloes were firm. Soft bangle tusks advanced £5 to £10 per cwt. There was none of the Malta description offered.

SMYRNA FRUIT MARKET.

Messrs. C. J. Giraud and Co., of Smyrna, report as follows for the week ended January 12:—

The arrivals on the market since the opening of the season are estimated at 35,500 tons, and the sales are put at 33,600 tons. Stocks are visibly diminishing, and dealers are unable to replace their sales except by fractional purchases in the inferior at a heavy advance in price. Every indication points to prices reaching a higher level next week. Inferior grades are running out.

The reopening is announced of the Constantinople branch of the Deutsche Bank, which will trade under the title of the Deutsche Bank Filiale Konstantinopel.

WESTMINSTER BANK.

The Trade Outlook.

Mr. Walter Leaf's Address.

The annual ordinary general meeting of the Westminster Bank, Ltd., was held at the head office, 41, Lothbury, E.C., on January 24. Mr. Walter Leaf (the Chairman) presided.

The Chairman said it was a matter of satisfaction that, after several years of great depression, they were able to meet the shareholders that day with a definite feeling of confidence and hope for the coming year. They could, indeed, not speak of 1923 as a year of prosperity. The first nine months of it were spent mainly in marking time; they had to be content if they could say that they were not losing ground. But so much at least was true; they were not losing ground. It was clear that money was being made, and was being saved; for issues of new capital were rapidly absorbed. Great Britain had again taken her place as a lending nation, and the London market was the best for a foreign borrower. Foreign and colonial loans issued during the year amounted to over £130 millions; and it was these overseas loans which formed the best foundation for the expansion of the export trade. Sterling borrowed here had to be taken abroad, directly or indirectly, in the shape of goods. It was, therefore, natural that there should have been during the year a considerable expansion of exports from £823 millions to £886 millions. That imports should have risen to an even greater extent, from £1,003 millions to £1,098 millions, while at the same time they were lending so freely abroad, was conclusive evidence of a very satisfactory growth in their invisible exports, the services of various sorts which they rendered to other countries, and the return of profits from their overseas investments. Though the effect of this revival on trade activity had shown itself rather tardily, yet the evidence of the last quarter of the year was fairly unanimous in speaking of better conditions and hopeful prospects. Not, of course, that the prospect was uniformly rosy. There were several very important industries in which, unfortunately, it could not be said that the corner had been turned. But in the majority of the bank's reports from all over the country they heard, in one form or another, that the outlook was considered good, and that the new year was opening with confidence and hope. It could not be too strongly stated that any real advance during the coming year was conditional on the absence of serious labour disputes. The outlook in this respect was by no means clear of anxiety, and was the darkest spot on the horizon.

Generally, they must not forget that the indications of improvement which these reports revealed were only promises—the fulfilment was not yet. It was vain to talk about prosperity while the number of the unemployed still stood at over a million and while the shadow of a veiled war still hung over Central Europe. Their best wishes went with the new Committee appointed to advise the Reparations Commission, and if they could find some way out of the maze they would deserve the thanks of mankind. What that way might be he could not guess. The position of Germany looked to him well-nigh desperate. One thing was certain, that reparations paid by Germany could come through one channel alone—through an excess of German exports over imports. It was only by taking German goods that they could receive German payments, and in order to enable Germany to produce this surplus German industry must first be allowed to re-establish itself.

Referring to the Fordney Tariff as an excellent illustration of the way in which international payments were made in goods, he said that that very high tariff was designed with the especial intent of excluding foreign goods and in the belief that other countries could not dispense with the products of the United States. Comparing the figures of trade between the United States and Great Britain for the first nine months of 1923 and the first nine months of 1922, he observed that one would suppose—at least, the authors of the Tariff supposed—that there would be a great falling-off in the exports from Great Britain to the United States, while the exports from the United States to Great Britain would be maintained. What were the facts? The exports from the United States to Great Britain had fallen off by more than £16 millions, while the exports from Great Britain to the United States had increased by over £10 millions. The balance of trade had thus moved nearly £27 millions in favour of this country, revealing that there were opposite influences which overcame the obstacles put in the way of exports from abroad. The Fordney Tariff offered an instructive example of the futility of political measures which tried to counteract the irresistible tendencies of economic law.

They had had, he went on to say, some experience of this at home quite recently. The gradual signs of a return to normal trade conditions were not enough to satisfy the impatient spirits, who thought that the natural processes of healing had better be interrupted in order to try the effect of various violent prescriptions, each of which was warranted to relieve the present distress, at what future cost it did not seem to concern their supporters. First came the suggestion of deliberate inflation to the tune of £100 millions. This was disowned with fair promptitude, but not before it had done great harm; foreign capital had taken fright, the value of sterling fell in the world markets. It had hardly begun to recover when there came the next prescription of Protection, and with it the General Election, to put before a large part of the electorate the awkward question, "Which do you dislike most, Protection or a capital levy?" They all knew the result. The political situation was piquant and interesting; but for the business man not wholly unsatisfactory. Business wanted to be let alone; they had enough of Government interference during the war, and they had no desire to be made the subjects of rash experiments in economics, whether they took the form of deliberate inflation, Protection, or capital levy. And from the fear of such experiments the election had delivered them, probably for a good many years to come. Government, it seemed, would in the near future be a matter not of rash legislation, but of administration carried on under constant and jealous observation, and subject to short shrift if it overstepped the limits of justice and sanity.

That was not a prospect to inspire any serious alarm for the present. There was undoubtedly a feeling of uneasiness abroad—there had been a certain amount of selling of sterling investments in order to buy dollars. That had shown itself in the fall in the New York exchange; the fall which began with the talk about inflation had not been recovered as it should have been, and the £ sterling stood at a value in dollars which was considerably below its real purchasing power. In other words, the £ was depreciated not by any undue balance of trade, but for political and sentimental reasons. This ought not to be. Any pressure to sell British and buy American securities was not merely unpatriotic, but, in his opinion, very foolish. He had heard an expert opinion from America which asserted that it would be easy to lose in American investments quite as much as in any capital levy. And it might still be within their recollection that shortly before the War there was an active movement for investment in Continental securities, with the idea of evading income-tax—dishonestly, of course. Those who adopted this course burnt their fingers badly, and deserved to do so; they might fairly be held up as a warning to those who were contemplating a similar course now. But however unpatriotic and unwise these weak-kneed folk might be, how infinitely more unpatriotic and unwise would it be to feed the anti-British Press in America with panic-mongering, and deliberately to damage the credit and reputation of the country in quarters where such attacks on Britain were cherished and magnified, and spread broadcast over the whole American Continent? There was, as a matter of fact, no panic at present; there was a certain nervousness among the ranks of amateur investors; but it was the duty of those who were in positions of responsibility to look calmly at the facts, apart from any prejudices of personal or political disappointment and resentment. Such a dispassionate view, he was sure, led to no counsels of despair. It seemed to him that the convalescence of the country, after the fever of the war and the disastrous destruction which it involved, was proceeding with all the steadiness for which they could reasonably hope; "the patient is doing as well as can be expected," and the need of the day was, as before, for patience, work, and peace.

The year had not been one of any violent fluctuations or startling events for the banker. The rise in the Bank Rate in July had been the most prominent event, and that did little to ruffle the surface of the stream. Rates of interest had still remained at a figure where they could not be regarded as any serious hindrance to commerce. Their deposits, like those of their competitors, dropped to a certain extent during the first part of the year. They had since recovered somewhat, apparently a sign of a more rapid circulation of money. That would be, as he had said, their last meeting in the old room, so it was their first meeting under their new name. The step taken in March last had been a matter of universal congratulation, and had certainly won the sincere approbation of those of their friendly competitors who were, like themselves, burdened with top-heavy titles.

The report was unanimously adopted and other formal business transacted.

A cordial vote of thanks to the Chairman terminated the proceedings.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Better Tone in Evidence.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended January 26, states:—

A brighter tone has been evident in the market during the past week, the larger inquiry referred to previously having been maintained, and in fact extended, whilst the prices offered, though still far from satisfactory, show improvement.

Yarn.—There has been a good inquiry, and, generally speaking, the situation appears a little more encouraging. A scheme has now been evolved for the control of the American spinning section with a view to putting a stop to sales at prices which do not cover the cost of production. The scheme involves levies on the work-people and employers who will be able to carry on under these terms for the benefit of those who will be compulsorily idle. The proposals are under consideration, and there is believed to be a good prospect of their being agreed to. Egyptian spinnings continue in fair demand.

Cloth.—The persistent inquiry from India has strengthened the belief that there is a genuine desire to purchase on the part of merchants there. A few operations have taken place for China, although this market as a whole remains very disappointing. Egypt and other Near Eastern outlets continue to buy very sparingly.

Raw Cotton.—Quotations have been steadier than in recent weeks, but have advanced to a small extent every day except one, and are approximately ½d. per lb. up on the week. The sales in Liverpool continue to be small. Closing prices are as follows:—American Fully Middling 19.81d., Egyptian Fully Good Fair 23.35d.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS.

The following extracts are taken from recent reports received by the Imperial Ottoman Bank:—

JAFFA, January 5.

Considerable rain fell during the week. Orange prices continue to be moderate.

TEHERAN, December 22.

The market has greatly improved, and the kran has reappeared owing to the approaching Christmas festivities. The outlook is good for the end of the year.

NABLUS, December 29.

There has been little business in grain and cotton goods this week. The market for native oils has been very active owing to the demand from the soap factories, and on account of the poor olive crop in this country the prices of oils are high.

BASRAH, December 29.

The reports from the interior with regard to agriculture are encouraging for grain exporters. Important consignments of grain arrive daily by sailing ships and rail. A large stock of barley and wheat estimated at 1,500 tons is awaiting shipment to Great Britain. There is no change with regard to imports.

The report current a few days ago in Paris, which has since been reproduced in London (says Reuter's Paris correspondent in a message dated January 28), that the Roumanian Government had refused the 100,000,000 f. loan already agreed to by France, is now semi-officially described as inaccurate.

It is reported that Mohammed Ouchaki Bey, father-in-law of Kemal Pasha, is at present in Brussels, and has had conversations with various Belgian financiers and industrialists with a view to securing their interest in the economic equipment of the port of Smyrna and the construction of railways in Turkey.

Cotton and Cotton Goods.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Strength of the Statistical Position.

The Alexandria Commercial Company, in their report for the week ended January 11, state:—Since our last report the futures market has been quiet, with a weak tone prevailing. The uncertain political situation in England created by the recent General Election has caused an atmosphere of uneasiness, which has also affected the cotton market unfavourably. Liverpool since the turn of the year has been decidedly weak, and at many periods our market was at the same price, whereas earlier in the season the former was at 1d. to 1½d. premium, which nearly covered the export expenses. New York, too, has been much easier, and March there dropped to about 34c. on the 10th inst. The demand from abroad has been rather limited, the only buying of any importance being from the Continent. A feature of the week has been the strength of the Ashmouni, due to the smallness of the available stocks of this variety. The difference between March Sakel and February Ashmouni narrowed to 1.92 dol., against 3.15 dols. a week ago and 3.65 dols. a fortnight ago. At the first January tender 1,750 krs. dockets were issued. The strength of the statistical position is asserting itself as the season progresses. The movement in the interior has further slackened, and in our opinion henceforth the weekly stock figures in Alexandria will show a steady decrease. The week's arrivals amount to 145,276 krs., against exports 209,608 krs.; the stock stands at 2,186,298 krs.

Futures Quiet and Dull.

A further report, dated January 18, states:—

Since our last report the futures market has been very quiet, the tendency still remaining downward. Our market has been dull and business transacted very limited, trade and speculation having both kept more or less out of the market. In Liverpool and New York the same state of things has prevailed. The demand from abroad has not shown any signs of improvement—in fact, we think that it has been poorer than the previous week. The paucity of the demand must be attributed, we suppose, to the unsettled political situation in England and to the recent heavy depression of the French exchange, which naturally disorganise trade to a certain extent, and make buyers in England and the Continent hesitate about entering into fresh commitments. In America, too, the textile trade is apparently at present not very good, and that explains why, despite the meagreness of the stocks of Egyptian cotton held there, there has been of late such a small demand from that quarter. At the second January tender 1,500 krs. dockets were issued. Spot round F.G.F. is strongly held, as the supplies of these qualities are far from ample, and the consequence is that the January position keeps very firm, and the difference with March has now dropped to about $0.25 only. A feature of the week is the heavy export, to both England and the Continent, the bulk of which, however, is in execution of old commitments. The available supplies have this week been further reduced and stand now at about 3⅛ million kantars (Alex. 2 million, up-country 1⅛ million), whereas at the same time last year they amounted to about 4⅜ milion (Alex. 2½ million, up-country 1⅞ million). The week's arrivals amount to 74,456 krs., against exports 258,276 krs. The stock stands at 2,002,478 krs.

Spot.—We have had a rather quiet week at Minet-el-Bassal, and sales for the five business days amount to about 13,750 bales, of which we estimate 8,900 bales Sakel, 4,700 bales uppers, 100 bales brown and pilion, and 50 bales white. As last week, demand from spinners has been only moderate, and there has been no weight of buying. Arrivals this week show a heavy decrease from last week, and exports have been on a good scale. The stock once more shows a marked decrease.

Sakellarides.—All styles have been dealt in, and, as has been the case for some weeks past, cotton from good fair to fully good fair to good has been most in demand. There has been, however, a quiet but steady business done in the lower grades. Prices of spot against contracts are generally rather dearer than last week, fair and fully fair especially so.

Uppers.—All styles have been dealt in with a good demand for the high grades. Prices of spot against contracts are generally dearer, especially in low grades.

Brown and Pilion.—A small business has been done. Prices of spot against contracts are without much change, excepting the lower grades, which are remarkably dearer.

White.—A retail business has been done at hardening rates.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Market Fairly Steady.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended January 23:—

Egyptian Spot.—In spite of a political crisis and a partial railroad stoppage our market has remained singularly unmoved during the past week, and fluctuations have been only of a minor description. The inquiry for spot cotton has continued much on the same lines as during the previous week, but a healthier tone has been in evidence since Monday last, and the sales effected show a substantial increase on last week's total. The basis for Sakellaridis cotton still tends to harden slightly, and the demand has generally been in the neighbourhood of 75 to 125 "points on March." There has, however, been a somewhat noticeable accession of business in the better qualities, and as much as "300 on" has been paid for Sakellaridis on several occasions. A few inquiries for "off" cotton have been in evidence, but business down to about "100 off" has been of a very limited description. The customary demand for "Low" cotton has not been quite so much to the fore. In Uppers a fair business has taken place, and the difference between F.G.F. Sakellaridis and Upper has widened out by 40 points. Good Uppers have been on offer at about "25 off March," a basis which appears very reasonable in face of reports from Egypt, which are unanimous in prophesying a scarcity of this cotton in the near future. To replace such cotton in Egypt at the present time would cost about a penny per lb. more, and it is probable that the Liverpool stock will dwindle rapidly if this difference is maintained.

Rather more interest has been shown in Brown cotton this week, but some difficulty has been experienced in bringing buyers and sellers together, and it is doubtful if much actual business has resulted. Only a small trade has taken place in Sudan cotton. C.i.f. business has ruled very quiet, and is likely to continue to do so whilst Alexandria maintains the differences existing to-day. Manchester reports, considering everything, have been fairly optimistic, and spinners continue to "take" cotton freely, last week's forwardings again passing the 14,000 figure. Estimated sales, 2,400 bales Egyptians and 100 bales Sudan. Quotations of Upper and Brown show a decline of 30 points on the week, but Sakellaridis is 10 points higher on balance. F.G.F. Sakellaridis to-day, 23.20d.

Lord Inchcape and Sir Charles Addis have been elected Vice-Presidents of the Sound Currency Association.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

"Plectuntur Achivi."

The stars in their courses have fought against M. Venizelos. Called back to Greece against his will, in order to save his fellow-countrymen from themselves, he has found his health unequal to the task. For the second time in his life he has summoned spirits from the vasty deep of Greek emotion and has been obliged to relinquish control of them at the very moment when success has seemed to turn entirely on his personal supervision. He was the originator of the scheme for a Greater Greece—a will-o'-the-wisp that ultimately plunged his country into disaster. He has lent the full weight of his unique authority to the Republican theory for Greece, and now that he has to relax his hold on her destinies the storm that he hoped to ride to the nation's advantage promises to become a whirlwind, bringing ruin in its wake. Republican intransigence is held to have aggravated his illness, and may yet take charge of the situation in Greece. The success of M. Venizelos's mission depended upon his ability to cajole the warring factions into sweet reasonableness. The conduct of his royalist enemies, after a discreditable outburst in the Press that greeted his arrival, has hardly given cause for reproach; the stumbling-block has been provided by a small clique, of whom little would probably have been heard if M. Venizelos had not declared himself their partisan. Irony could go to no further extreme even in Greek drama's classic flights of imagination. It need cause little surprise that numbers of his countrymen see in him the evil genius of Greece, while contemporary Europe is prepared to place him high among the statesmen of the day. The true friends of Greece, with whom the interests of the country must ever rank above all considerations of persons and parties, can only hope that the Greek nation will yet issue out of its present ordeal strengthened and more faithful to itself.

A Leaderless Greece.

The outlook for Greece at the moment is dark. M. Venizelos has resigned his office of Prime Minister, and there is no recognised leader to step into his place. History, it is to be feared, will decide that M. Venizelos's ignorance of Greece has been responsible for his own undoing and for that of his country. He misjudged his countrymen when he led the revolt against King Constantine; he grievously overestimated Greece's capacity and Turkish psychology when he sought to build a Greater Greece on the Allies' victory in the War. He gave his approval to the Revolutionary movement which has driven the country still deeper into the morass of civil strife; he supported the idea of a Republic, which promises to put the finishing touch upon Greece's misery. His reluctance to return to Greece was, no doubt, due in part to a realisation that he had lost his hold on Greek affairs. When, at the earnest call of his countrymen, he finally agreed to forsake France for Athens the chance of wiping out the mistakes of the last eight years by a piece of constructive statesmanship must have appealed to him. But the nerve of the Cretan leader of men had already gone. It was no longer the Venizelos who had stood his ground before an Athens crowd and by sheer force of will bent it to his way of thinking. He gave his blessing to the Revolutionary Committee; the Republicans could already count on his support; he preached peace and reconciliation, but formed a Government exclusively from his own party. At the first sign of trouble his health failed him, and he leaves Greece hopelessly bogged in the slough of despond. If we seem to stress the final failure of M. Venizelos, it is merely to encourage Greece to shake herself free from the benumbing effect of the theory that there can be no salvation apart from M. Venizelos. The best thing that could happen for the country would be that by tacit consent the association of political parties with the name of Venizelos—pro or anti—should be dropped, that the Republican challenge should be frankly met, and the people divide themselves on the constitutional issue of Monarchy or Republic. The past seven years, with their feuds, vendettas, murders, and executions, should be blotted out as an evil nightmare. The Greek who will deserve most at the hands of his countrymen will be the Monarchist who can show himself moderate and conciliatory enough to rally to the Monarchist banner alike Royalists and those Liberals who have not worshipped with M. Venizelos at the Republican shrine.

The Fiume Treaty.

The text of the Agreement between Italy and Yugoslavia regarding Fiume bears out the published forecasts of its terms. Complete sovereignty over the port and city of Fiume, together with certain adjacent territory, is accorded to Italy; complete sovereignty over Port Barosh and the Delta to the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. Italy agrees to let Yugoslavia, on a lease of fifty years, the basin in the port of Fiume known as Thaon di Reval, with the exclusive use of two warehouses and three docks. Other clauses of the treaty deal with the status of the railway station, and fix the boundary between Port Barosh and Fiume. A serious cause of friction between the two countries has been eliminated; but for the arrangement to be a commercial success for Fiume, all the parties concerned will need to give effect to its provisions with the most complete good will in the details of everyday working.

Angora and Constantinople.

Antagonism between the views of Angora and Constantinople continues to colour most of the news received from Turkey. The Government has appreciated the wisdom of recalling the egregious Tribunal of Independence, the members of which are probably not so much to blame as those who created the Tribunal and sent it on its foolish mission, and the last may, perhaps, have been heard of plots against the Republic. It would seem as if one of Turkey's chief difficulties would lie in the anomalous position of the Grand National Assembly. A special feature of the Turkish Constitution, on which the authors are inclined to pride themselves, is that it makes the Assembly the supreme power in the State. The position of the Sultan in the Monarchy is not taken theoretically by the President under the Republic, but by the Assembly. There is, therefore, a tendency not only to regard the collective Assembly as something sacred, but also to invest every single member with a halo of sanctity and superiority. Clearly this attitude cuts athwart the true Republican theory, and the Turkish man in the street, or man on the land, is beginning to doubt the wisdom of a system that creates so many demi-gods, especially as they have the habit of voting themselves salaries and then increasing them. Angora is exposing itself to the charge that it has called the new Turkey a Republic, but is trying to make it an oligarchy, and that the only plot against the Republic is to be found among the deputies, who resent free speech and freedom of thought. Possibly part of the trouble is due to the absence of Mustapha Kemal Pasha; but if it is so, the weakness of the Republican theory in the East is at once shown. A strong man may rise to power and proclaim a Republic which can carry on while he is on the spot to control it; but the Oriental, although willing to recognise a superior, will not regard in that category the man who has not carved his own way to the position, but affects the position on the strength of some new-fangled Western device called popular election.

The R.A.F. in Irak.

The facile lie about "tax-collecting by bombs" in Irak still runs its course in the yellow (and green) Press, and has recently been revived, as a result of belated information regarding certain air operations in that country. Some soreness, it is to be supposed, lingers in these quarters over the failure of the "scuttle" agitation of a year or two ago, and any reference to the Royal Air Force in Irak is seized as an opportunity for returning to the charge, in the hope, no doubt, that the several million readers, who have no chance of learning the truth, will still believe that Irak is such an impossible and outlandish place that mere residence there converts our airmen into ghouls from sheer love of spending the taxpayers' money. An official communiqué reminds the British public once more that bombing does not take place in Irak because taxes are in arrears, but because the peace of the country has been threatened. There are, as everyone knows, arguments for and against the use of aircraft against natives, and the subject is seriously discussed as if the native appreciated being killed by a rifle bullet or shell, but had a justifiable grievance against bombs. The Yellow Press, however, is not concerned about the ethics of the question, but merely wishes to justify a certain line of action of its own that fell very flat a little while ago. It is overlooked that the best judges of whether aircraft should or should not be used in a particular instance are almost certainly to be found on the spot, and that the best training ground in the world for the Royal Air Force is where they are continually confronted with active service conditions. Anxiety for the taxpayer may prompt the same zealous Press to urge the keeping of the Navy in dry dock and the forbidding of aircraft to leave the ground; but we trust that each new Government that is called upon to consider the question will decide that the right course for each of these services is to gain as much experience as it can of its own element.

Indian Religious Discord.

The terms of the latest "national pact," drafted to secure peace between the Hindus and the Moslems of India, differ so widely from previous essays in the same direction that we fear their discussion would at any time be likely to do more harm than good; but, beneath the variations in detail, there lies the fundamental defect that the politicians who devote so much ingenuity to preparing these concordats leave human nature entirely out of account. It is doubtless a fascinating pursuit to ring the changes on joint or separate electorates, on the distribution of the spoils of office, and all the other familiar topics, but the central fact of the situation is that the nerves of the two communities, normally thin-skinned as they are, at the moment lie absolutely exposed, so that even the lightest touch irritates. The skilled physician would advise that every form of irritation should be avoided until the skin grows again, but eager politicians persist in poking their clumsy fingers at all the sorest places, and then wonder that the patient's discomfort goes on increasing. To our mind, such pacts should be framed in times of comparative tranquillity, not when the good men of both communities are grieving, and the others are seeking, or making, causes of fresh offence.

The Claim to Berar.

A decidedly interesting situation is created by the Nizam of Hyderabad's request for the restoration of Berar, the territory of which his father gave a perpetual lease to the British Government in Lord Curzon's time, and which has since been practically incorporated in the Central Provinces. From the financial standpoint we take it that Lord Curzon made a tolerably good bargain. Berar is one of the great cotton fields of India, and is now much richer than it was, with the prospect of further gains from high prices, and from improvement in the quality of its produce, so that the Nizam's desire to recover the administration is entirely in accord with the traditions of the old India. Meanwhile, the inhabitants have shared in the political privileges granted to British India during the last few years, and their elected representatives stand for still further constitutional advance. Logically, they ought to rejoice at the prospect of

Digitized by Google

Indian rule, but it is somewhat doubtful whether they would welcome the conservative type of administration which prevails in Hyderabad, and if, as we suppose, the British Government is not inclined to insist pedantically on the letter of the old arrangement, the case seems to be one for the application of the fashionable expedient of a prebiscite.

The Bombay Cotton Strike.

The news that the Bombay cotton mills are again idle does not excite much surprise, for there have been signs of trouble for some time past. On the surface the nature of the dispute is clear enough, the employers having refused to pay the workers an annual bonus, which, having been given for a few years of high profits, has, in accordance with Indian mentality, come to be regarded as a custom; but there are hints that the strike is by no means unwelcome to some of the mill-owners, who find that, owing to the world-shortage, the price of their raw material is inconveniently high. A more sinister suggestion has also reached us to the effect that the strike has been fomented by speculators who, having sold cotton forward, would now welcome a temporary fall in price. For the credit of Bombay we hope that there is no truth in this suggestion; but in the light of past happenings, it cannot be absolutely ruled out, and, whatever influences may be at work, the fact remains that the industrial life of the great city is for the time being suspended.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

London and Paris.

The Government has started out on its determination to resettle Europe with a letter from Mr. Ramsay MacDonald to M. Poincaré. This letter is a personal one, and so it has gained the widest publicity. In this letter the British Premier reminds M. Poincaré that they each have their separate public opinion, and he states quite definitely that it is possible to be frank without being hostile.

We shall see. Hitherto the politicians who have spoken in this strain to France have contrived only to be hostile without being frank, but with a Labour Government it may all be so different. At least we must patiently wait, and give our present Administration a chance to make an impression on the gallant obstinacy of the French Premier. But, to judge by the renewed agitation for the removal of M. Poincaré now proceeding in the British Press, together with the time-dishonoured prophecies of his defeat at the approaching French elections, it scarcely looks as if there is much chance of the new London's reforming the old Paris.

Still, frankness without hostility is something to be promised. . . . The coming fight will, in fact, be for the championship of the world, and one can only hope that it will be fought out in the amateur and not the professional spirit.

Britain and Russia.

For long there had been little real backbone to the movement to postpone indefinitely recognition by this country of the Bolshevist Government: opposition to Moscow was mostly instinctive or the surviving result of past indignation. The act of the Labour Government, therefore, in according to the Soviet de jure recognition cannot meet with any considerable antagonism. This recognition, moreover, is a curious affair; it appears to leave the British Government with many loopholes. The present condition of Georgia, for example, seems by no means to have been forgotten by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald; and altogether the Note is a canny production.

The Government had to indulge themselves in recognition because they had so promised, and it would, perhaps, be foolish to expect immediate results from this hurried step. Where trade with Russia is possible it has been carried on for many months—Italy and France have already got without recognition what it was possible to get. And certainly this country will be impressed only by business results. On the ethical plane of the question, when they think about it at all, our people are by no means on the side of the Bolshevists.

Dissolution of the "Nationals."

The other day the headquarter staff of the National Liberal Party was disbanded, and thus came to an end one of the stupidest and least successful movements of modern times. Officially it is being regarded as the final establishment of complete Liberal unity, but if anyone were to say that it means the relinquishment by Mr. Lloyd George of all hopes of leading his party he would be pitifully smiled upon. "The man who won the War" is the joker of the Liberal poker hand; he will certainly use himself as such when the stakes are high enough.

The Conservatives' Problem.

While the question of Liberal unity is thus shown to be officially solved, the Conservatives are in a nice quandary. Shall Protection be in their programme or not? That is their problem, and there are no signs at present that they know how to answer it. Some say that Mr. Baldwin is their Jonah, and should, with his policy, be cast overboard; others, who see that without Protection the party has nothing to distinguish it from anything else, and who are also swayed by worthy regard for their fallen leader, wish to stick to the Tariff policy, in the hope that with education the country may persuade itself of the advantages of it.

In any case, the Conservatives must, before they dream of coming into power again, get some ideals into their programme, which at present are painfully empty of anything but barren honesty.

Peace and Patriotism.

It would seem that our Government is likely to lose what it gains on the national swings on the international roundabouts. Quite one of the worst things that could possibly have happened to it was the publication of the recommendation, signed by certain eminent members of the present Cabinet, that one Mr. E. D. Morel should be awarded the Nobel Peace Prize. The point is not that this Mr. Morel—that is the name he is best known by—is not most admirably fitted for the prize, but that his life's work should be considered worthy by the present Government of public applause. Whatever Mr. Morel may possess, he has never been accused of having the slightest patriotic leanings: all his work in recent years, in fact, has somehow or other redounded to the benefit of Britain's enemies.

The City Election.

The City was true to its traditions, and easily returned the Conservative candidate. One could see little difference in the professions of the two candidates, but apparently the City thought that if the Liberal were returned he might conceivably have to vote for Socialistic measures, and that was quite enough to ensure his defeat. The present member is, one supposes, pledged to oppose all Socialistic measures, and what could be more intelligent than that? At any rate, it sufficed.

"The Fair and Fatal King."

Last week there was a touching little ceremony at Charing Cross, when the anniversary of the execution of Charles I. was marked by the casting of wreaths on his monument there and the holding of a service there by the staunch little band of Jacobites. The ceremony has, of course, been held for years, but this year it was marked by the presence of two Grenadier Guards in uniform—a curious way of emphasising the sad impertinence of it all.

Jacobite sentiments would seem to be held for the most part by the ultra-educated of the country, although in rural districts you may still hear the word "Hanover" applied by the common folk as a term of reproach. But it was impossible not to be moved by this pathetic ceremony on January 30, and to think regretfully back to "The saddest of all kings crowned, and again discrowned."

A Memorial to Animals.

A keen dispute is now raging over a proposal to erect near Hyde Park Corner a memorial to all beasts and birds that died in the service of the Empire during the War. There are some people who say that all loss of life in the War should be commemorated, and there are others who say that this is fanaticism and sentimentalism run mad.

The ordinary person, whose instinct in this matter is very sound, will keep out of the controversy. He will say that to commemorate the pigeons which died in the tanks or the goldfish that died when being used as a test for gases is going to absurd lengths, but that to commemorate the horses which perished nobly in the War, and which our men befriended as did no other nation, would be a very worthy act and one peculiarly in consonance with the dignity of the British people.

When extremists assert that all life is beautiful, it should be sufficient to remind them of the late Clutton Brock's pertinent remark: "Yes, perhaps so. There is the wart-hog, for instance." And to those who say that you cannot draw a line you merely answer that you can—at horses.

The R.W.F.'s Flash.

It always seemed an anomaly during the War that only the officers and staff sergeants of the Royal Welch Fusiliers were allowed to wear the "flash," which had been the regiment's proud possession for nearly a century. One could never understand how it was that the Gloucesters, the only other regiment to wear something at the back, were all permitted to wear their distinction and the rank and file of the Royal Welch were not. However, official approval has now been given that all ranks of the Royal Welch may for ceremonial or for walking out wear the flash. The move, I know, will be very popular.

Football.

It is difficult for an Englishman to take sides when Wales and Scotland are playing each other; his choice is likely to vary from year to year in accordance with the bearing of the result upon England's chances in the Calcutta Cup. He was rudely disappointed on Saturday, therefore, if he hoped that a win by Wales would make England's hopes at Twickenham next month brighter, for Scotland appear to have swamped the Principality. They had playing the same three-quarter line which put the fear of the Lord into all the Cambridge supporters in the University match. England and Scotland should this year be a game of games.

More general gloom, however, was caused by the smashing defeat of the Corinthians by West Bromwich Albion in the Cup. To get beaten by five clear goals suggests poor preparation, or else absolute inferiority; one hears that there was something of both in the Corinthians' defeat. Incidentally, one does sometimes wonder whether those fabulous old Corinthians were quite so good as is made out by the old school; perhaps it is that the Corinthians have not deteriorated, but that their opponents have incredibly improved.

THE NORTH-WEST FRONTIER.

"The North-West Frontier" was Lord Montagu of Beaulieu's subject when he lectured to the Central Asian Society at the Royal United Service Institution on January 23. Before the lecture Sir Maurice de Bunsen, who was in the chair, presented to Colonel A. C. Yate a bowl, given by members of the Society in recognition of his services as secretary of the Society. In presenting this token of the Society's regard for Col. Yate, the chairman referred to the great strides which the Society had made during Col. Yate's period of office (1918-1922).

Lord Montagu emphasised the fact that the country west of the Indus, the North-West frontier, belonged properly to Central Asia. From Central Asia had come all the great movements of history, and the life of the inhabitants of this region had always been one of unrest. He did not doubt that if our command were withdrawn from India, wild bodies of men, whether Baluchis, Afghans, Bolshevists, or combinations of border tribes, would sweep down to the rich plains of India. There was in this part of the world but one method of meeting such force, and that was by force. In the frontier district there were, as potential enemies, 400,000 men, so that Britain's position must always be strongly held. To ensure this nothing was so important as good roads. In this respect a great improvement had been effected in the last two years, and if things went on as they were now being carried out it was possible to hope for eventual peace. For roads meant a respect for property, property meant trade, and trade meant stability.

The lecturer showed a number of very interesting lantern slides, illustrating the various passes, the Khyber, the Kurram, the Tochi, and so on, the roads, and other achievements of British engineers, and the nature of the country from the Indus to the Jhelum. In remarking upon these he again emphasised his moral that roads are the essential thing on the frontier: they are mightier than armies, stronger even than the rupee, and, especially, in no case should railways be permanently preferred to them.

BRITISH MUSLIM SOCIETY.

The Egyptian Minister, Aziz Izzet Pasha, on February 3, visited the Mosque at Woking, where the British Muslim Society presented him with an address of welcome on his first official visit to England. The address was read by Lord Headley, President of the society. The Egyptian Minister, in the course of his reply, said that it was the desire of Muslims to win complete equality with Western nations, but if they were to master Western science they must work very hard indeed. While they were aware that the West must for many years to come be their teacher in the sphere of the technical sciences, they claimed that they, too, had something to teach the West in the domain of spiritual culture, and they believed that the history of Islamic civilisations deserved more study in Western universities than it received at present.

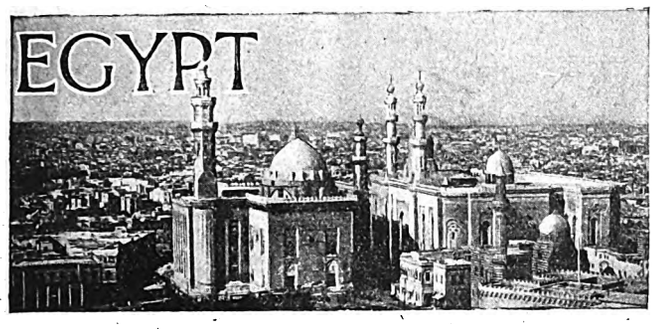
From Our Own Correspondents.



Cairo, January 20.

End of the Elections.

Polling for the forty-one seats in the original contests for which no candidate secured an absolute majority over all his opponents took place on Thursday, with the result that twenty-nine Zaghloulist candidates, ten Neutrals, one Liberal Constitutional, and one Nationalist were elected. The various party strengths, as nearly as can be computed, are now as follows:—Zaghloulists 179, Neutrals 20, Liberal Constitutionals 9, and Nationalists 3—a grand total of 211, which, with the three frontier district constituencies where polling has not yet been carried out, makes up the Chamber of 214 deputies. The Neutrals have had relatively more success in the supplementary elections than in the contests whose results were announced last Sunday, so that, after all, the first Egyptian Chamber of Deputies may contain an Opposition of thirty odd; but it will be a very ragged and undisciplined little force to oppose itself to the—temporarily, at any rate—big and well-ordered battalions of the Zaghloulists. The only Opposition member of any personality and influence is Mohammed Pasha Mahmoud, Vice-President of the Liberal Constitutional Party, and he may find himself, when the time comes, with the barest handful of supporters, for already the newspapers are announcing that successful candidates who stood as Neutrals are rallying around Zaghloul.

Political Party Evolution.

It looks as though the near future may see interesting developments in Egyptian party politics. The Nationalist Party, for months past split into two rival camps—the one headed by Aly Bey Fahmy Kamel, brother of the late Mustapha Pasha Kamel; the other led by Hafez Bey Ramadan—has suffered so complete a reverse at the polls that for the present it has ceased to count at all as a political force. The chief trouble with the Nationalists in the past has been the inability of the party leaders to agree on the attitude to be adopted towards the intrigues of the ex-Khedive. A section of the party has been loyal enough, another group almost openly the reverse. On top of division has come the return of Sheikh Shawish, with his appeals to religious fanaticism, which, it is pleasant to note, very few Egyptians can stomach these days. Shawish's speeches have further split the Nationalists, so that now the party, which at best amounts to scarcely anything, is a series of parties within itself. On the other hand, one of the Nationalists' war cries about complete independence for the whole of the Nile Valley still makes an excellent propaganda weapon. It is almost certain that, when the time comes for official negotiations, there will be much talk about the Zaghloulists "giving away the Sudan," and then will come the chance for the Nationalists, allied perhaps with the "Party for the Liberation of the Sudan and Egypt," which has been talked of for some time past, but has not yet hatched out, to gain for themselves a new lease of life on the strength of a patriotism more ardent than that of the Zaghloulist negotiators.

The Liberal Constitutionals.

It is difficult to foresee the immediate future of the Liberal Constitutionals. Following on their rout at the polls has come the resignation of Adly Pasha Yeghen, the President of the party, in the councils of which he has never taken a very active part, but to which the prestige of his name has meant a good deal. Youssef Cattaoui Pasha, one of the leading Egyptian Jews, has also resigned from the council of the party. Cattaoui Pasha also has not played a very large part in local politics, but his going is significant, because, without disparaging the great part played by his race in building up the prosperity of Egypt, it is permissible to say that Oriental Jews are usually not slow in dissociating themselves from what they regard as lost causes. The present nominal leader of the Liberal Constitutionals is Mohammed Pasha Mahmoud, but, although he is extremely rich, and exercises great influence in the district of Upper Egypt, where his estates are situated, Mohammed Pasha lacks many qualifications essential in a leader. The ablest member of the Liberal Constitutionalist Party is Dr. Hafez Bey Afifi, to whom politics are only a diversion from his work as a specialist in children's diseases. The party looks to be in for a difficult time, and whether it can survive in its present form only the future will show.

is the resignation of the Cabinet, which, tendered to the King on Thursday evening, has, at His Majesty's request, been deferred until after the conclusion next Thursday or Friday of the royal tour, beginning this afternoon, to the Canal area and the Sinai Peninsula. As soon as Zaghloul Pasha expressed it to be his opinion that the Ministry should vacate office in favour of a successor formed more in accordance with popular ideas, as expressed in the elections, it was obvious that Yehia Pasha would resign, especially as it is known that he has never had the slightest intention of clinging to office a moment longer than necessary. Yehia Pasha and his colleagues have deserved well of their country. In ten months they have accomplished more than did all their predecessors of the preceding four years put together. Taking office after the well-intentioned but hopelessly mistaken efforts of the Nessim Cabinet had, in three months, produced complete chaos, the Yehia Ministry in a similar period had secured the release of Zaghloul Pasha and the other political prisoners, the promulgation of the Constitution, the abolition of martial law, the passing of the Indemnity Act, and had concluded the agreement for the retirement of foreign officials in the service of the Egyptian Government. But during the past few months the Government has seemed to grow very old and very tired. Control of the country's affairs has been relaxed, everything has been permitted to drift, until it has seemed to observers that the only officials still retaining the energy and courage necessary to the taking of decisions have been three or four young Under-Secretaries of State, whose ambitions have been gratified by remarkably rapid promotion, and who have known so well how to make hay while the sun has been shining—it is not suggested that they have used their influence in any improper manner—that, by general consent, the way to get anything done is to reach the ear of one of these very popular young men. So timorous has the Government grown of late that a regular practice, before taking any decision, has been to announce in the Press as a fait accompli the proposed new measure, which has been promptly withdrawn if it aroused too unanimous a howl of protest. In some ways, seeing the difficult transition stage through which he has been in control, the Premier cannot be blamed for the adoption of these tactics, but they have certainly not increased popular respect for Government. It is to be feared that obituary notices of the Yehia Ministry will scarcely do justice to its early fruitfulness in good works, so much has memory of these been obliterated by the Cabinet's more recent senile impotence.

The Senatorial Elections.

The main reason behind the wish of the Zaghloulists to get control of the Government as soon as possible is not, however, connected with any administrative shortcomings of the present Cabinet, but with the fact that the Premier in power will do the advising in connection with the King's appointment of the nominated 40 per cent. of the Senate. It is only natural and right that Zaghloul Pasha should have the chief voice in this matter. The most interesting point will be to see whether that voice is exercised direct or through some nominee Premier. There is very much speculation on whether Zaghloul Pasha will himself form a Ministry, or whether, on grounds of indifferent health, or of policy, he will prefer to suggest to the King the name of Tewfik Pasha Nessim, Ahmed Pasha Mazloum, or Mohammed Pasha Said, who, in the order of preference given are considered the most likely Premiers if Saad Pasha himself declines the honour.

The Season in Full Swing.

In a bare two months we shall be seeking the shady sides of the streets again, and ladies attending the final race meetings of the Cairo season will be wearing thin silk clothes, and yet– up to the present—Cairo has hardly attained its annual winter whirl of activity. The first big cruise has yet to come, and the hotels, for the most part, are by no means full. All of which serves to emphasise the exceeding shortness of the Egyptian season nowadays, and explains the bills with which the hotels confront staggered tourists. When there are only two and a half to three months in a season money has to be made while the making is good, and the people who come in embarrassing shoals in February and March have to pay for the people who do not come during the other ten months of the year. The hotels' point of view is perfectly clear, but that does not alter the fact that the tourist industry in this country is not at present on a sound basis, and that a serious slump in America might easily mean that there would be for that year practically no season at all. One of the saddest sights to be seen around Cairo is the huge Heliopolis Palace Hotel, said to be the finest hotel in the world and to cover more ground space than any other, with exactly eleven visitors staying there. The reason, of course, is that the kind of visitor who is making a long stay in the country and who can afford the loss of time involved in living out of town no longer comes to Egypt in any numbers. Now our tourists are here to-day and gone the day after to-morrow.

Sport.

The Amateur Golf Championship of Egypt was decided last Sunday at Gezira, the final being between two soldiers—Colonel C. J. S. Grant, Chief of the General Staff at G.H.Q. here, and Captain L. M. Kerr, who is stationed in Alexandria, and who won. The Hakoah football team from Vienna concluded its tour in Egypt and Palestine with a somewhat unexpected defeat at the hands of an Egyptian eleven representing Cairo. Next Saturday Cairo and Alexandria meet at lawn tennis in the annual Bally Cup competition. In sport, as in politics, this is the busy season.

Cairo, January 27.

Political Prospects.

Cabinet-making is the favourite political pastime of the moment, for although, up to the time of writing, there have been no further developments since King Fuad's return on Friday from his tour of the Canal area, there is little doubt that the present Ministry's resignation, tendered before the commencement of the Royal journey, will be accepted in the very near future, probably to-day or to-morow. Then the King will send for Saad Pasha Zaghloul and, to judge by all present indications, the Wafd leader will accept the task of forming a Cabinet. During the past week an effort has been made by the Zaghloulist Party to sound public opinion regarding the advisability of Zaghloul's personally undertaking the Premiership. As one of the leading Zaghloulist organs has said, "To Zaghloul the voice of the people is the voice of God, and by it he must form his decision." Regarding the direction that popular sentiment takes there is no longer any doubt. Every newspaper in the country favours a Ministry under the personal leadership of Zaghloul Pasha, and the prominent public men who have been interviewed on the subject have all, with the solitary exception of Prince Omar Pasha Toussoun, expressed the same view. Zaghloul Pasha cannot, therefore, consistently do otherwise than accept the responsibility of leading the first Egyptian constitutional government. Nor is there any reason to suppose that he is unwilling to shoulder the burden of office. Six, or even three, months ago it was considered most improbable that the Wafd leader would, in the event of his party being in a majority, himself form a Cabinet. But much has happened since then. He has secured a majority greater than he had hoped for, and, above all, a Labour Government has come into power in Great Britain.

All Eyes on England.

This last factor has had a greater bearing on Egyptian politics than the simple fact of its meaning that the British Government of to-day is likely to be more sympathetic towards Egyptian claims than the Baldwin Cabinet of yesterday would in itself warrant. Conscious of their own lack of experience in matters Parliamentary, Egyptians have been watching events in Great Britain with the keenest interest. The fact that Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, despite the uncertainty of his position, has not hesitated to accept office has made a great impression here. It is felt here that if the leader of British Labour, despite the apparent insecurity of his tenure of power, did not shrink from assuming responsibility for the government of his country, then if Zaghloul Pasha, with everything in his favour, did not show at least equal courage, his action would probably receive very unfavourable comment abroad, and especially from the British Labour Party, from which Egypt's leader hopes for very considerate treatment.

The Zaghloulist Programme.

The example of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald has been more closely followed than by a mere imitation in accepting office. At the banquet given by the successful Zaghloulist candidates for the Chamber of Deputies on Friday evening at Shepheard's Hotel, Zaghloul Pasha, who seems to have made a complete recovery from his recent illness, made a speech very reminiscent of some of the declarations of the present British Prime Minister. In the first place, it was a very moderate pronouncement; secondly, it avoided any sort of provocative reference to contentious subjects; thirdly, it frankly recognised the great responsibilities devolving upon the party which has succeeded at the polls; and, finally, in its description of the future as a period of work and constructive effort, with the making of Egypt a better place in which to live, for natives and foreigners alike, there was a distinct resemblance to Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's "habitations built upon the horizon." Certainly, Zaghloul Pasha, in his first public speech after the election, has made a favourable impression.

Ministerial Possibilities.

Reverting to the question of Cabinet-making, which is the obsession of the hour, it is already apparent that Zaghloul Pasha is going to be faced with an embarrassing number of candidates for the posts at his disposal. Even if, in this first Ministry, he is left an entirely free hand, and no portfolios are reserved for Palace nominees, there will still be many more would-be Ministers than Ministries. How to satisfy all the Coptic candidates is the greatest problem, for the Coptic element has provided most of the brains of the Wafd, and yet the Cabinet cannot contain more than two, or three, Copts at the outside without causing grave discontent among the Moslems. Hitherto no Egyptian Ministry has had more than one Copt.

Limitation of Polygamy.

A report, extremely interesting if it be true, has lately appeared in the local Press to the effect that the Ministry of Justice is considering the draft of a law designed to give practical effect to the Koranic injunction that a Moslem shall not take more than one wife unless he is in a position to ensure absolute equality of treatment to each of his spouses. Although the marrying of more than one wife is now comparatively uncommon in Egypt, and is confined almost exclusively to the lower classes, it is still of sufficiently frequent occurrence to be the cause of a lot of unhappiness, and, not seldom, of crimes of jealousy. Naturally, the commandment regarding equality of treatment has been, in practice, almost impossible of fulfilment, and has been more honoured in the breach than in the observance. But it is now stated that the Ministry of Justice intends to insist that before a man can take to himself a second, third, or fourth wife he must obtain the written consent of the Minister himself, who must previously satisfy himself that the proposed second marriage is being undertaken on grounds recognised by the Koran—e.g., incurable illness or sterility of the first wife, and that the husband can and will guarantee the similarity of treatment which Moslem law postulates. In effect, of course, the new measure, if enacted, will almost eliminate polygamy, and is therefore greatly to be welcomed. Whether or not it ever becomes law, the credit for having made it a subject of popular discussion rests almost entirely with the Egyptian Women's Union, which, under the courageous presidency of Madame Huda Sharawi Pasha, is doing a great work in ventilating social evils in this country.

The Social Season.

Egypt has during the last week experienced the most extraordinary weather. For seven days the average daily periods during which the sun has shone cannot much have exceeded three hours—a most unusual thing for this country. Severe storms have visited the Eastern Delta, with the result that coastal shipping has been much held up, and King Fuad's tour, among other things, has been interfered with by the weather, the Royal yacht being much delayed on her journey through the Canal by sandstorms. The first of the big tourist cruises of the season, that of the s.s. Adriatic, has been delayed a day by foul weather, with the result that Shepheard's first big fête of the present winter, held last night, lacked most of the American visitors for whose especial benefit it had been arranged. Still, there are numerous Americans here, and some at least are spending their money freely. The other day, in the bazaar, an American head of a family was observed asking for a pure silk Bokhara carpet which must be exactly 10 feet by 7 feet. A carpet, not a particularly attractive specimen, of the required size and material was produced, and, on the price being asked, £E800 was named. The American, without a word, pulled out his cheque-book and filled in a cheque for the sum asked. The dealer, brazen fellow though he was, was almost overcome, while my informant, who witnessed the transaction, had to rush away to avoid the temptation of telling the American how great a fool he was. After all, times are bad these days for the Mousky merchants, and they should not be grudged an occasional windfall, though it is saddening to think that the carpet seller had probably never, in his wildest dreams, hoped to get £E200 for that carpet, and would probably have parted with it to a competent buyer for £E100. It is astounding what sums some of the tourists spend in this country. A lady—also an American—casually remarked to me the other day that she was seriously thinking of paying the £E1,800 which a dealer was asking for a pair of statuettes: and that without taking any expert advice as to their genuineness. And yet the profits of the antique dealers are nowadays nothing compared with what they reaped before the War, for it is seldom now that they have a customer with more than a comparatively few pounds to spend.

Digitized by Google

Port Said, January 23.

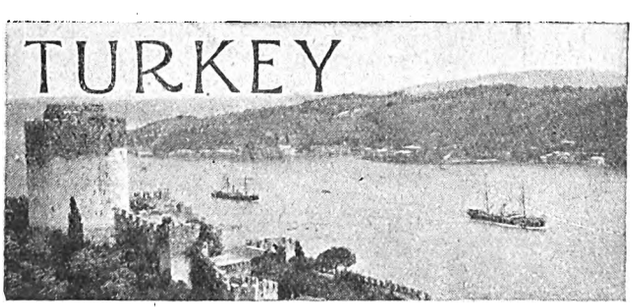
King Fuad's Tour.

King Fuad arrived at Port Said by train on Sunday evening, and after a drive round the town, which was brilliantly illuminated, His Majesty went on board the Royal yacht Mahroussa. The harbour, with its lavish illuminations, presented a beautiful sight.

The next morning the King landed and visited the schools and Government Hospital. In the afternoon a reception was held at the Governor's house, when the religious and other notables of the place were presented to His Majesty, and a garden party, to which many were invited, followed.

Early on Tuesday morning the Royal yacht, with the King on board, left for Kantara, where His Majesty took train for El Arish.

He returned to Kantara that afternoon, and immediately the yacht left for Ismailia, proceeding two days later to Suez.



Constantinople, January 28.

Severe Weather.

The political events of the past week, although by no means negligible, have been entirely eclipsed by the weather—at any rate, in Constantinople. Since last Thursday it has been snowing heavily, and the few intervals between the bursts of blizzard have done nothing but accumulate greater reserves of snow for the next burst. This unusually severe weather would appear to be fairly local, for the railway communications with Europe have not been seriously interfered with, but it has caused a great deal of suffering in Constantinople, where the proportion of the population out of work or dragging out a weary existence on the most miserable pittances is really terrifying. The cold has been, and still is, intense, and how the thousands of poor, whose wooden houses, huts, and shanties leak like sieves in every direction, succeed in keeping body and soul together passes comprehension.

Squalls at Angora.

In Angora there are two political storms raging. The more spectacular one arose on the question of the increase of salaries of members of the G.N.A. During a sitting at which only about half the members were present a motion was passed by a majority of 30 to increase salaries to the equivalent of £450 a year—i.e., a 50 per cent. increase. This has made the whole of the intelligent electorate very angry indeed. The Press, almost without exception, is spitting fire. The reason for the increase is given as the cost of living in Angora. The papers retort by the pertinent remark that they are responsible for that by being there, and that that difficulty can easily be removed, as Angora is not the only town in Turkey. It is also pointed out that University professors have to manage on about £10 a month, judges on less, and a crowd of lesser functionaries on ridiculous pittances. These officials are prohibited from adding to their incomes by engaging in trade, whereas deputies with £38 a month may engage in any profit-making enterprise they please, and they have arranged that the legislative duties of the individual deputy do not occupy more than three months of the year; for the remainder of the year he need not remain in Angora. Another important remark, made by the Vatan, is that the proposal was turned down some time ago by the Budget Commission; this merely serves to bear out my contention in my last week's letter that the estimates for the Budget, even when otherwise they might bear some relation to fact, are useless, because such resolutions of the Assembly stultify them.

The Press and the G.N.A.

Feeling between the Press and the Assembly is running so high that there was a tussle between a deputy and a Press correspondent in the corridors of the Assembly, and since then access to the lobbies of the House has been denied to the Press. The Assembly is now coming out in its true colours. On the principle that a country gets the government it deserves, however, no sympathy can be felt for the electorate; they trooped like a flock of timid sheep to the voting urns last summer and voted submissively for any puppet that a group of masterful men put before them, and now they are reaping the fruits of their political cowardice and inanity.

The Anatolian Railways.

A less spectacular but more interesting incident has arisen à propos the eternal Anatolian railway question. Ismet Pasha's government has been acting suaviter in modo, but fortiter in re, in support of the reasonable and practical decision they have taken to back the agreement made between M. Huguenin and the late Minister of Public Works, Mukhtar Bey. This agreement has met with strong opposition in the Chamber, and it has required the guile of the serpent to prevent this divergence of views leading to a vote against the Government and the consequent resignation of the Cabinet. Ismet has been juggling, not unsuccessfully, with such materials as the Chamber, the People's Party, a new special commission, the sacrifice of Mukhtar Bey, and keeping up a long game of "passing the baby." This led to an outburst on the part of Fethi Bey in the Chamber of which he is the President, during which he very strongly upheld the opposition view on the subject of the railway. Turkish circles regard this outburst as a manifesto on the part of Fethi, and some predict for him the same humiliation as that suffered by Reouf Bey at the hands of Ismet. That may be; what appears important, however, is that another fairly prominent personality has openly ranged himself with the Government's opponents, and that fact cannot be regarded as contributing to the stability of the Government.

Turkey and the British Government.

The change of Government in England has excited considerable interest here. The Turks cannot quite make up their minds whether the arrival of the Labour Government will operate to their advantage or not. They disliked Lord Curzon's whips intensely, but they are in mortal fear lest Mr. Ramsay MacDonald should be but the precursor of Mr. Lloyd George, whose favourite weapon is scorpions. On the whole, the Turkish Press is as pleased with the British Government as they can be with anything British at the present moment, and as their obsession in their relations with England, apart from the ratification of the Peace Treaty, is the settlement of the Mosul question, they openly write that, as the Labour Government is likely to be an ephemeral one, they, the Turks, had better hurry up and settle the Mosul question while it is still in power.

General News.

There is little to add to what I have previously written about the commercial situation here. As far as the draconic regulations about the immediate closing down of foreign business houses are concerned, they have been modified in practice, although theoretically still operative. The mean has been found by extending the period allowed for completing the formalities of registration by another three months. This is only fair, when it is remembered that several firms who applied for registration months ago have been menaced with extinction simply because Angora's administrative machinery works so slowly that the necessary authorisations have not yet come through. The comedy of the Pera Palace Hotel has entered upon a new phase. The Turkish tenant whose enterprise in renting it from the Government at £T100,000 a year was much applauded in chauvinistic circles, has failed to come up to scratch in finding the necessary guarantees, and the authorities have thought it best to leave it for the present to be exploited by the existing management. A very pretty bit of administrative pirouetting!

"CROSSING THE SAHARA."

The film, "Crossing the Great Sahara," that is now being shown at the Palace Theatre, is probably the most interesting travel film that has ever been published. It is the record of the expedition, led by Capt. Angus Buchanan, and financed by Lord Rothschild, which in 1922 and 1923 worked its way from Nigeria to Algeria. The main objects of the expedition were zoological and geographical, and it would appear from the film that they were in large part happily obtained. The specimens of wild life that the expedition has brought from Northern Nigeria, Western Sudan, Air and Ahaggar, the oases of Fachi and Bilma, and the Algerian oases, are extremely fascinating, particularly the birds and the desert foxes. As is well known, the results of this Saharan expedition are of the highest scientific value, and many of the specimens are already in the British Museum or in Lord Rothschild's keeping at Tring.

No person interested in travel or in zoology should fail to see this film. Even to those not scientifically minded the habits and customs of such people as the Fulani or the Tuaregs, of whom some excellent photographs have been secured, and the alternation of hill and sand in the desert must surely appeal. It is, perhaps, a pity that so much time should be devoted in the film to places like Kano, which is comparatively well known, at the expense of more interesting places, such as Agades, but the ordinary spectator will possibly not notice the lack of proportion; neither is he likely to be disturbed by the undue abundance of the "sub-titles." Captain Buchanan himself delivers at each performance of the film a brief explanatory lecture.

ABYSSINIA.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

Addis Abeba, December 31.

The Central Government.

It is understood that the Abyssinian Government are considering the new position created by the admission of Abyssinia into the League of Nations. They are chiefly occupied with the problem of how to ensure that the obligations which they have now incurred towards the League shall be honoured in the outlying provinces and on the frontiers of the Empire as well as in and around the capital. There can be only one solution of the problem—a strong Central Government enjoying the respect and the confidence of the rulers of the Provinces. How to arrive at that solution, as all who have seriously and honestly studied the subject know, is the real "Abyssinian Question"—the repression of slavery, reforms in the administration, and such like are all subsidiary to this. It is possible that when the ideas of the Central Government have crystallised on the subject, the bigger chiefs will be summoned from the Provinces and invited to give their views.

Meanwhile a special Commission has been appointed to study the whole question of slavery and to draw up regulations to govern the future relations between slaves and their masters. The personnel of this Commission will have to be strengthened if its recommendations are ever to see the light of day or to carry any weight.

Britain and Abyssinia.

It is to be supposed that the British Government also are taking stock of the situation; and if, as a result of so doing, they could see their way to making a clear pronouncement of their policy with regard to Abyssinia it could only do good. If the truth were known it would probably show that for the last few years the British Government have been entirely indifferent to affairs in Abyssinia, and have had no settled policy with regard to this country. In any case, the policy which they have followed for the past few months would appear to have received a check at Geneva. The Abyssinians know that Great Britain opposed their admission to the League and that France supported it. To them, therefore, the result of the negotiations at Geneva was a victory for French policy over British, and there have not been wanting the usual mischief-makers to ascribe the worst motives to our opposition. A declaration of policy, a definition of the attitude of the British Government towards the change of circumstances, is clearly needed. As a schoolmaster does who has fallen asleep over a blackboard demonstration, and has become involved to his own confusion, it would be as well to pass the duster over the board and to restore confidence and prestige by restating the proposition in a few terse sentences on the cleaned surface. The declaration of the British Government might well be couched in the following terms. First, that they welcome the inclusion of Abyssinia in the League in so far as it will safeguard the independence of the Ethiopian Empire, and provide a channel for the amicable discussion and settlement of any differences which exist or may arise in the future between the two Governments; that Great Britain will gladly avail herself of the good offices of the League should disputes arise, and will, of course, be bound by the decisions of the League in such cases. Second, that their opposition to the admission of Abyssinia to the League was due to a fear that the Central Government was not yet strong enough to ensure that the obligations which they would incur on entering the League would be respected by all the chiefs in the outlying parts of the Empire; that if this fear were well grounded the Abyssinian Government might well be landed in the gravest difficulties should they undertake obligations which the event showed they were powerless to carry out. Moreover, they feared that Abyssinia, as a member of the League, might be tempted to import larger quantities of arms than the Government could properly control; that this would lead to such a recrudescence of the arms traffic as would inevitably bring Abyssinia into conflict with Great Britain, and that they felt that the friendliest course was to warn the Abyssinian Government of this danger. The Abyssinian Government could rely, however, on the British Government assisting them in every possible way to carry out their obligations to the League, in particular by lending their support to the Central Government (in so far as a foreign Power could do this). Last, that the special aims of the British Government in Abyssinia were (a) to push British trade to its legitimate limits for the interest of both countries; (b) to obtain for the use of Egypt and the Sudan the fullest benefit from the waters of the Blue Nile and Lake Tsana; and (c) to secure justice for British subjects residing within the Ethiopian Empire, and to protect the rights acquired by them.

The Regent, Ras Tafari, is to visit Europe in the summer. It is very desirable that before he starts on a journey from which he will return with ineffaceable impressions his confidence in the friendship of Great Britain, which has undoubtedly been shaken by the course of recent events, should be restored by some such declaration as I have indicated. To emphasise the importance of such a declaration it should be conveyed to the Abyssinian Government by a Special Envoy.

Need of a Clear Policy.

The besetting sin in Abyssinia is procrastination—it permeates the whole life of the country, and is due to lack of education, lack of a strong Government, and the absence of any inducement to better themselves in the great bulk of the population. The result is that development is slow—too slow—and the wiser heads recognise this and regret it. They believe, however, that Abyssinia in entering the League has submitted to a yoke under pressure of which progress will be certainly accelerated. As Abyssinia has of her own choice put a lever into the hands of the Powers, it is for the Powers to apply it for the furtherance of their legitimate aims and to speed up progress in Abyssinia, without, of course, forcing the pace unduly. The British Government may have wished to continue on the old lines, but it cannot be said that the results obtained in the past have been such as to justify a predilection for the old methods. In any case it is absurd to suppose that they contemplate doing otherwise than recognise the fait accompli, and, that being so, they should make the most of it. Lack of firmness wins no more respect in Abyssinia than elsewhere. The Abyssinians, or some of them, know that they have put a weapon into our hands, and failure to use it will be regarded as weakness or indifference. We should show, therefore, that we mean to use it without delay.

A serious cause of complaint against the Abyssinian Government exists at the present moment, and it would illustrate the procedure which I suggest should be initiated if I state how it should be applied in this particular case. I refer to the administration of justice in suits between British and Abyssinian subjects. These cases are dealt with by a tribunal known as the "Special Court"—a Court in which the foreign Consuls sit on the bench and assist the Abyssinian Judges. It is enough here to say that the inability of this Court to dispense justice to foreign subjects is a growing scandal. There are at the present moment over 150 cases in which British subjects are involved awaiting settlement, and most of these cases have been dragging on for months or years. I doubt whether the Court sat more than thirty times in the past twelve months to hear British suits or gave more than a dozen decisions. In cases where judgment was given in favour of a British subject it has generally been extremely difficult, if not impossible, to obtain execution of the judgment against the Abyssinian. Here is a matter which should be put right—and speedily. I submit that the British Government ought to send out a legal expert, whose opinion would carry weight, to report on the state of affairs. This expert should draw up a memorandum for submission to the Abyssinian Government detailing the grounds of complaint, and perhaps making recommendations for the improvement of the constitution and procedure of the Court. The Abyssinian Government would be invited to consider the memorandum and to discuss the whole question with our representative. If no progress were made, the British Government would suggest that the matter should be referred by both parties to the League, and in any case would themselves raise the question before the League. The Abyssinian Government could take no possible exception to this procedure, the adoption of which they have themselves invited by their action in entering the League, and I am convinced that by proceeding in this way we should secure in a very short time the sweeping out of this particularly dark corner.

It would be wrong, as I have said, to try to force the pace unduly. We have the right and the duty to insist on justice and fair treatment being meted out to our own subjects, and to secure our frontiers from violation. In such matters anything but firmness merely earns suspicion and contempt. But the Abyssinian Government and people have the right to demand that all other action on our part shall be dictated primarily by a consideration for the best interests of Abyssinia. Now that the bugbear of loss of independence has been removed, the Abyssinian Government will be able to judge calmly of the motives of the foreign Governments with whom they have dealings. The Abyssinians are a people whose contempt is easily roused by bluster or vacillation. They are also a people who respond quickly to straightforward and sympathetic treatment. This letter is an attempt to suggest a method by which that response may be evoked.

THE ITALO-YUGOSLAV PACT.

The Conventions that have been concluded between Italy and Yugoslavia are not only important in themselves, as establishing a détente between the two countries, but they may also exercise a profound influence on the history of South-Eastern and Central Europe in the near future. In these circumstances it is not without interest to examine the treaties in detail, in order that their possible bearing on future developments in the Near East may be more closely followed. The Fiume Agreement concerns Italy and Yugoslavia alone, if we may regard the interests of the town and its inhabitants as identical with and merged in the interests of one or other of the countries or of both. The event may prove that, wrapped up in the Fiume question, are conflicting interests wholly incapable of satisfactory adjustment, and that a settlement has been reached only at the expense of one or other set of interests. This fact would not, however, detract from the merit attaching to the action of the Italian and Yugoslav Governments in arriving at an agreement which renders the long-standing Fiume controversy innocuous for the time being. A second Convention, the "pact of friendship and co-operation," stands in a different category. This agreement supplies the two countries with, as it were, a turntable connected with a whole series of railway lines radiating in every direction of European politics. The Italian or the Yugoslav locomotive may never be moved on to that turntable, but may remain each in its present territory. If at any time, however, one or other should happen to use the turntable with steam up and an uncertain hand on the lever, the temptation to explore one of the radiating tracks may be overpowering. In justifying the Treaty between Czecho-Slovakia and France, Dr. Benesh has laid stress on the dominant factor of fear in the composition of post-War Europe, particularly in the case of the Succession States of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. If his diagnosis be correct, it says little for the structure built up by the treaties of peace, although it may account for the pacts that various nations have hastened to make among themselves. It is, however, one thing to plead fear and another thing to justify it. An impartial observer would have imagined that the only possible risk of aggression that either Italy or Yugoslavia has hitherto run came from the other, owing to the disagreement over Fiume. Consequently, as soon as this bone of contention has been resumed, both parties can entrust themselves without the least misgiving to the League of Nations, and leave the political future of Europe to look after itself. They have preferred, however, to safeguard themselves against particular emergencies, and it is permissible to attempt to understand what may have been in the minds of the statesmen of the two countries in drafting the agreement.

In view of the fact that the only real danger spot on the horizon for each country was provided by the other, we should have expected that the pact of friendship and co-operation would have been careful to eliminate this menace for all time. A precedent was established in the Treaty between France and Czecho-Slovakia, in which the contracting parties agree that all future disputes which may arise between them, and which cannot be settled by agreement and diplomatic means, shall be submitted to the Court of International Justice or to special arbitrators. The cynical may be tempted to point out that, as the risk of hostile collision between France and Czecho-Slovakia is, owing to geographical considerations, remote, the practical contribution made to the cause of the world's peace by the inclusion in the treaty of a compulsory jurisdiction clause is insignificant. Such a clause in the Treaty between Italy and Yugoslavia would have been of special value; but it is conspicuously absent. In its place we find elaborate provision for keeping each country quiet, if the other should be engaged in squaring accounts with a third party. Only in the event of "international complications," when both countries agree that their common interests are threatened, do they pledge themselves to come to an agreement on the measures to be taken for their protection. In case of unprovoked attacks on either of the contracting parties, the other pledges itself to remain neutral for the whole duration of the conflict. This provision, it is added, also applies in case the security and interest of one of the contracting parties are threatened by attacks from without, when the other contracting party pledges itself to give political and diplomatic support through friendly co-operation with the object of removing the danger. Of such a pact it has to be admitted that "co-operation" is stressed in it far more than "friendship." The two parties appear to be more concerned with safeguarding themselves against stabs in the back than with promoting the cause of true peace. By imposing neutrality on the other when one country may decide that its "interest" is threatened, the two Governments deliberately deprive themselves of the friendly intervention that might make for peace. For the "political and diplomatic support" that is to aim at removing the danger "through friendly co-operation" would seem to bind each country to make the other's quarrels its own rather than to leave it a free hand for impartial mediation.

Half a peace, however, in the present instance, is better than no peace. If the wording of the treaty between Italy and Yugoslavia seems to have been prompted by the tradition of the irreconcilability of the Balkan Peninsula, we may take heart from the reflection that at least it does nothing to aggravate that irreconcilability. On the other hand, the pact does impose upon Italy, by inference rather than by actual stipulation, the duty of refraining from any policy that would promote unrest in the Balkans. The agreement, it is to be hoped, is the swan-song of the last exponent of the old school of Balkan politics. Subjected to the worst interpretation, it would mean that Italy has deliberately abdicated from her rôle as a Great Power in so far as she is morally bound to use her influence for the promotion of peace in the Balkans: for if the Macedonian question, for instance, were to flare up to-morrow, she would be debarred from adopting an independent attitude in regard to it. Happily, the pact may not be brought up against such an extreme case. A new school of thought is gradually gaining ground in Yugoslavia: it has helped to keep the peace with Italy for several years, and if it seems powerless at times against manifestations of the old Balkan spirit, the leaven is, nevertheless, at work. All that may be legitimately regretted in regard to the Italo-Yugoslav Pact is that Signor Mussolini lost such a splendid opportunity of strengthening the hands of that new Yugoslav school of thought.

THE MACEDONIAN PROBLEM.

By DRAGUTIN P. SUBOTITCH.

[In view of the wide interest now being shown in Macedonia, we have asked Professor Subotitch, Lecturer in Serbo-Croatian in the University of London, King's College, to write on the subject from the Yugoslav point of view.—ED.]

You published in your issues of the 24th and 31st ultimo certain articles relating to the present conditions in the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes and Bulgaria, and dealing also, directly and indirectly, with the "Macedonian Question." My letter is not an answer to those articles, but it is connected with them in that it deals with the same subjects.

It should present also one good point, in that it offers the honest opinion of an average Serb, who is far from being in any way connected with politics, but who, nevertheless, is frankly convinced that it is expedient for Serbs and Bulgars to live side by side in peace and brotherhood; but who in the same way sincerely believes that it is not possible to realise, at the present time, that ideal for which the Serbs have striven since their liberation 120 years ago.

First of all, let us glance at history. In the war of 1912-13, which was the result of an alliance between Serbia, Bulgaria, Greece, and Montenegro, the Serbs liberated Macedonia from the Turks, who had taken it from them in the fourteenth century. But it is well known that the Bulgarians, instead of going to Petrograd for the arbitration already agreed upon, treacherously attacked the Serbian army, their allies of the day before, in order to deprive them of Macedonia. Bulgaria was defeated and lost the case which she had wished to decide by arms and treachery. In 1915 she invented the absurd pretext that Serbia had violated her frontier and attacked her from the back when she (Serbia) was at war against the aggressive Austrians and Germans.

The many Golgothas and monuments raised above collective graves, as well as the inquiry made by the Inter-Allied Commission, to which Great Britain sent a delegate (Colonel H. B. Mayne), bear witness to the character of the Bulgarian régime in Eastern Serbia and Macedonia, during the period when these lands were occupied by "Mother Bulgaria." I mention this, not for the sake of opening old wounds, but to bring this matter to the attention of all those who, from time to time, manifest their sympathy regarding injustices which have been or are being done to Bulgaria, and to bring forward the fact that these crimes were committed only a few years ago, and that there are many people alive to-day who suffered under the Bulgarian occupation. Nor could anybody, I think, deny the importance of this fact.

By the Treaty of Neuilly, Macedonia was returned to Serbia—that is, to Yugoslavia.

I do not mention these historical data in order to demonstrate that Macedonia is ours by force of arms, but in order to show what led up to the present situation, and how Bulgaria was attempting to solve the "Macedonian Question." At the present time she desires a revision of the results of her two-fold aggressive and treacherous policy, by the help of various committees and of the League of Nations.

In 1915 the Constitution of the Kingdom of Serbia was extended to Macedonia, which from that time has been known as South Serbia, and in 1918, after the second liberation, she again took part in the political life of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. It may clearly be seen, therefore, that it was Serbia who first introduced Macedonia into practical politics. Macedonia, from the end of 1915 to October, 1918, was in the occupation of "Mother Bulgaria," yet she was not represented at the Parliament of Sofia, nor is it difficult to divine the reason.

For the sake of those to whom it may not be clear, I quote the following from the Report of the Inter-Allied Commission on the Atrocities committed by the Bulgarians from 1915 till 1918:—

> The Bulgarians plundered the region of Morava and Macedonia with the same lack of scruple and the same cruelty that the Germans showed in Belgium and France. In view of the economic misery into which they plunged the population, it is really impossible to think that for one moment they considered that population as being an integral part of their nation.
> The Bulgarian crimes exceed the ordinary infringements of International law. They are crimes of common law, such as assassinations, murders, blows, wounds, violences, violation, attacks on personal liberty, pillages, extortions, fire, etc. The entire Bulgarian régime bears criminal mark.
> The responsibility for these acts should fall on the Bulgarian Government and on the Bulgarian Headquarters. These two factors cannot throw it on the local authorities, and specially on the organisation of the comitadjis. It is true that these comitadji organisations were the principal executors of these crimes, but they would not have been able to give full vent to their criminal instincts if the Government itself had not given them a free hand.

So much for the past. At the present time South Serbia has thirty-five representatives in the Parliament at Belgrade, elected by a secret and universal ballot, and all influence on the part of the Government is therefore out of the question at their decision. This was indirectly admitted by M. Raditch, who is certainly no friend of the Belgrade Government, to the Balkan Committee, and he has also written on this matter to the newspapers—namely, that the whole of Macedonia will vote for him at the next election. All the thirty-five delegates are by origin of birth Macedonians, and thirteen of those are Moslems. These, and not Todor Alexandroff, who has lately appeared so pathetic a martyr in a certain London newspaper, are the legitimate representatives of that peaceful people.

Moreover, these elected national representatives at Belgrade openly and clearly criticise the administration of Macedonia, although more strongly than it merits, as is confirmed by the records of the Parliamentary Sessions at Belgrade and by the Belgrade Press. The fact of such free criticism is the best of proofs that Yugoslavia is on the right road to a satisfactory settlement of her domestic affairs. Nobody can deny that the Government at Belgrade does all in its power to bring about satisfactory reforms, or that it has in this work the support of all parties. The abuses referred to are in no way connected with the present administration, which doubtless has its shortcomings, due to the insufficiency of some Government officials, but are mainly the result of the uncertain conditions under which Macedonia has been for centuries.

Neither can anybody deny that these conditions become more settled day by day. In the first place, it is necessary to their final adjustment that the frontier districts should be secured against the komitaji bands, who, by their insistent raids, or, rather, massacres, have been exterminating their erring brothers, "Bulgarians" or "Macedonians," who are not willing to accommodate them, or to undermine the "Serbian administration." The people of these remote and scattered mountain villages are oppressed not by a lack of schools and churches, as certain "reliable information" from Sofia represents, but primarily by their insecurity against the raids carried out by night and by day by Todor Alexandroff's "patriotic bands." They do not bring with them to "oppressed Macedonia" those Bulgarian or Macedonian books and gospels for which the people are—as they say—so eager, and which they might read if left in peace, but bombs and other attributes of their murderous activities.

The advocates of Bulgarisation in Macedonia have adopted varying attitudes in their statements concerning the Bulgarian character of Macedonia. Macedonia was once ethnographically "unquestionably" Bulgarian, "through and through." Now, however, we have a whole Macedonian revolutionary organisation, which advertises Macedonia as a separate ethnographic and political unit, with Salonika as its capital. We will not enter into these nuances, nor comment upon them, to prove what are the tactics of Bulgaria and the Revolutionary Organisation, the motto of which is "Macedonia to the Macedonians. C'est pour tourner la difficulté, as the French say, and to close one's eyes to these facts would mean the assumption of a comic-naïve appearance.

Everything should be called by its proper name. Todor Alexandroff, the Chief of the Revolutionary Organisation, and his bands were the undisputed masters of Macedonia during 1915-1918, but throughout the whole of that time we heard nothing of his present watchword, "Macedonia to the Macedonians," as is confirmed by the official report of the Inter-Allied Commission mentioned above. They constitute, however, an example of Bulgarian logic in their attempted solution of the Macedonian question. As to the assertion that the Serbs are denationalising Macedonia, we can only say that this is both absurd and impossible. If the Macedonians are not Serbs, no one can ever make them so; but it is indisputable that those superficial Bulgarian characteristics which have been enforced by means of schools and by the terror of 1870-1912, will be lost by those who may now possess them.

Therein is the reason underlying the feverish Bulgarian agitations against Serbia, both by propaganda abroad and by komitaji organisations in Macedonia.

It is the duty of every State to respect the frontiers of her neighbours, and she certainly ought not to countenance brigand bands, even those under "patriotic" colours, who raid the neighbouring country and who, having committed their murders, return peacefully whence they came, to replenish their spent stores of ammunition from State magazines, and to provide for their wounded in State hospitals, while awaiting an opportunity for a renewed attack. Yet all this is being done by Bulgaria.

It is an open secret that in Bulgaria, along the southern frontier which marches with Serbia, preparations have been in progress as though we were on the eve of war—the manœuvring of troops, the transport of ammunition, and the formation and distribution of komitaji bands on Serbian territory. Todor Alexandroff has been threatening from Sofia to invade Yugoslavia with 160,000 organised men in Macedonia, and he is seeking connection with all possible enemies of Belgrade. The almost permanent residence of Alexandroff at the capital of Bulgaria is no secret among foreign missions at Sofia, and he has to go specially to the eastern fontiers of Yugoslavia to receive the correspondents of foreign newspapers, who must motor from Sofia to see him and to receive from him his photographs and the necessary information for publication abroad. The Treaty between Yugoslavia and Italy has made a profound impression upon the Press at Sofia. Et pour cause (everybody well knows why).

We have not yet read any resolution on the part of a single foreign committee suggesting that Sofia has chosen a dangerous path in pursuing such a policy as her present one, but I believe that herein lies the danger, and that tacit agreement to those dangerous phenomena is urging Bulgaria upon a new adventure.

If there be any minorities, they can obtain satisfaction under the Yugoslav Constitution and Treaties; but it is the duty of all neighbouring States to take precautions that none of their citizens nor those enjoying their hospitality, shall violate the frontiers of Yugoslavia or agitate against her. That is a fundamental clause of international law. As to the close co-operation between the komitaji bands on Yugoslav territory and the Bulgarian frontier authorities, the best proof is that no komitaji bands have been able to cross to the right bank of the Vardar, or to organise themselves in that district.

It is the plain duty of every State to protect her frontiers and secure her citizens. The thirty-five legitimate representatives of Macedonia have themselves constantly asked in Parliament for protection against the violence of the komitajis. Surely the Yugoslav Government is not, in the face of those protests, to consult Alexandroff, the chief of the brigands, as to the ruling of her own lands. Anything that is wrong in Yugoslavia can be adjusted only by legal and constitutional means.

Unfortunately, there are those who believe the former to be the best way, and advise other than constitutional means of adjustment. To illustrate this we may give here an example which is at the same time a startling proof of the way in which some people give serious and, in fact, well-intentioned advice upon matters with which they are either superficially acquainted or about which they have been wrongly informed. Thus the special correspondent of The Times concluded his two recent articles on "A Revolutionary Chief" with the words: "Todor Alexandroff would probably be willing to enter into negotiations with the Belgrade Government . . . . If M. Pashitch and the Serbians on one side and Todor Alexandroff and the Macedonian Revolutionary Organisation on the other could meet and come to some sort of arrangement as here suggested, there is still a faint chance of trouble being avoided."

Could there be a more farcical suggestion than this? We are all for fair play towards a beaten enemy, but surely not towards a criminal. Moreover, we are asked to believe that this man (number 4 on the list of war criminals, whom Professor R. A. Reiss records as having ordered, while Prefect of Shtip during the occupation, 118 Serbian sick prisoners to be murdered in cold blood at the village of Lioubotine) holds now in his hands the peace of Europe! We hope that this example will give also a true moral photograph as an addition to the illustration lately published in London of this champion of "Macedonia to the Macedonians."

It may be said, in conclusion, that we often come upon public resolutions, passed by certain English societies and committees, concerning the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes. If these resolutions are to be of full value they should be the results of serious and competent inquiry into the questions which they discuss. When they mention "certain reliable information" which has caused them to discuss matters publicly, they should also publish the source of such "information," and then, when the matter has been debated publicly, this information can be taken as a basis for further discussions and final resolutions. Without doing this such information must be considered invalid and binding only upon those who have endorsed them.

General Sir Ian Hamilton delivered last week a lecture on the landing at Gallipoli before a meeting of the Anglo-Swedish Society at Stockholm. The audience included the Crown Prince and Princess of Sweden.

DE TEMPORE ACTO.

"THE POWERS AND THE TURK." By Sir George Greenwood, with a Foreword by Sir Edward Boyle, Bart. (London: Cecil Palmer. 3s. 6d. net.)

The author of this vigorous pamphlet gives us an echo of Gladstone's "Bulgarian Horrors and the Question of the East," but whereas the latter in 1876 preached the clearing out of the Turks "bag and baggage from the province they had desolated and profaned," Sir George Greenwood goes further and would have the Turk out of Europe. He divides the world into pro-Turks and anti-Turks, and pours out his indignation on the former. There may be pro-Turks as they are imagined by the anti-Turk, but they do not play an important part in British policy. It is certainly not fair to label as such the authors of the Lausanne Treaty. That document must be considered in the light of the events which immediately preceded it, and, briefly, these events were that the Turks had utterly defeated the Allies. It sounds ridiculous, of course, but it is the cold fact. As far as the battlefields of Asia Minor were concerned, the Allied ox had disappeared into the Greek Bovril bottle, which the Turks promptly stamped under foot. In such circumstances, to talk of 1918 and the Great War is as wide of the mark as to introduce Navarino or 1453. It is of no use to say that all that was wanted was union and firmness, on the part of the Allies. Quite true, but these things did not exist. Hence the Treaty of Lausanne. Fortunately, many of those who can agree with the main thesis of Sir George Greenwood's pamphlet—the utter hopelessness of the Turk as judged by his past—are so constituted that they must always be looking forward, and can put the past behind them. Accordingly they argue on this wise: the Turk must now either make good or do as he has done before. If he makes good, everyone must be glad that out of evil good at last will have come. If he does as he has done before, then for the first time Europe can deal with him with a clear conscience (at least let us hope so). Gone—let us hope—will be the beams out of Europe's eyes, the intrigues, the secret connivance at or inspiration of massacres, the breaking of Armistice pledges by the landing of troops on Turkish soil, in a word the scores of things that brought Europe down to the Turkish level. Then and only then will Europe have the power—because she will have the moral right—to turn the Turk out. In the meantime a good many people, who are not pro-Turk as pictured by Sir George Greenwood, recognise in the Lausanne Treaty the only possible expiation that Britain and her Allies could make for descending by proxy to the massacring and village-burning level of the Turk. As things now are, Europe and the Turk start afresh, and all that concerns us is what the Turk is now writing or will write in the future on the clean slate with which the Allies have gratuitously presented him. Past crimes, whether Turkish or of the Allied vicarious variety, no longer enter the picture.

A BISHOP IN INDIA A HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

"HEBER'S INDIAN JOURNAL," A Selection, with an Introduction, by P. R. Krishnaswami. (London: Humphrey Milford, Oxford University Press. 3s. 6d. net.)

This is the third volume in "An Eastern Library" published by the Oxford University Press. The first two volumes consisted of short stories and a novel by modern Indian writers. This time the publishers have given us selections from the Journal of Reginald Heber, who went out to India as Bishop in 1823, and died there in 1826. The selections are well arranged into such divisions as "Pre-British Capitals," "Holy Places," "Contemporary Personages," and so on.

The Bishop seems to have had a real interest in all that was to be seen and in what he learned of the customs of the people. His impressions and descriptions are written in a straightforward, pleasantly unaffected way. He was evidently anxious to be quite fair about everything, and was on the whole broadminded. He was interested in what was strange and sometimes stirred by beauty, as he shows when he is travelling in the Himalayas: "My attention was completely strained, and my eyes filled with tears; everything around was so wild and magnificent that man appeared as nothing and I felt myself as if climbing the steps of the altar of God's great temple." But generally the writings do not show much imagination, and there is something undeniably prosaic about them.

We are pulled up again and again by Heber's trick of description by rather incongruous comparison. In Benares "the streets, like those of Chester, are considerably lower than the ground floors of the houses." The Taj "contains—a central hall about as large as the interior of the Ratcliffe Library." The "Chandree Chokee" at Delhi "is about as wide as Pall Mall."

His remark, after noticing the devotion to the Hindu reformer "Swaamee Narain" of his disciples, is charmingly wistful: "In the parish of Hodnet there were once, perhaps, a few honest countrymen who felt something like this for me; but how long a time must elapse before any Christian teacher in India can hope to be thus loved and honoured."

There are many glimpses of life in India and of people of importance there a hundred years ago which are of real interest.

We are left with the impression of a man of great intelligence, a somewhat limited imagination, and most upright standards of life striving, with complete single-mindedness, to further the good of a vast and alien people. We notice that Heber took it for granted that his attitude was also that of the British officials with whom he came in contact, and we are convinced that in this Journal we may find much that is typical of the spirit which has built up the Indian Empire.

PRESS ON THE NEAR EAST.

The East and the West.

Writing in the January issue of the Fortnightly Review on "The East in Revolt," Major Arthur Moore discusses the various forms which the present intellectual and political revolt of the East against the West is taking. An attempt at fusion between the two is not practicable; but the plain difference (instead of the old assumed sense of superiority on the part of one) between them must be recognised. His conclusion is as follows:—

> There seems no reason why the new cleavage between the East and the West need be permanent. The answer lies largely with Great Britain, who is at present the principal sufferer, and with America, who is the greatest moral arbiter of our times. Britain has not lost her old instinct of political realism, and already is in process of adjusting herself to the new situation. Peace with Turkey, and Turkey's own proclamation of a Republic, coupled with the reduction in the grandeur of the Caliphate, are already making a difference. When the results of Britain's liberal post-war policy in India and Egypt have begun to mature, when the Mesopotamian adventure has been finally liquidated, and when Russia has become a settled state and made accommodation with the rest of the world, the fact that the British people is utterly devoid of appetite for further territory will become clearly evident to the East, and should produce a change of heart in Central Asia. The moral influence of America is already enormous, and is clearly destined to grow. If Britain and America have the same vision of just dealing in the West's relations with the East, the inner sense of the East will not fail to recognise this. It is difficult to suppose that a great clash between East and West can be altogether avoided. There is no rule of justice that can completely resolve an opposition of economic interests between races anxious to preserve themselves and to find land for surplus populations. But if India stays with Britain the British Commonwealth of Nations, already old in experience of the East, will be in a position to mediate in that clash, and prevent it from being a mere barbarian and gigantic colour war, which would certainly end most of the civilisation of this planet. If, on the other hand, India and Britain were to part company, it would be an ill day for the British Commonwealth; but for the civilisation we know, which in Europe's present collapse rests only on a precarious balance between East and West, it would be most serious of all.

Greece.

The New Statesman of January 19 points out that the obstacle to the rule of M. Venizelos in Greece is not merely political:—

> It is the murder of Gounaris and the generals which weighs Venizelos's Government down. That deed was a greater shock to the Greek people inasmuch as it linked their troubled, but not ensanguined, political life with the worst crimes of the Balkan States, and in the person of Gounaris himself, with the death of a blameless and high-minded man. Gounaris was an unwilling, indeed, a too loyal victim of an enterprise he never approved and would have stopped if he could. It would be impossible to make Venizelos directly responsible for his death; but it was widely thought in Greece that a sufficiently energetic word from him would have stopped the executions. That word was never spoken, and to-day his return to power appears, not as a reconciling gesture, but as a renewal of the earlier reign of proscriptions.

THE HITTITES.

Dr. D. G. Hogarth lectured on "The Hittites" before the Egypt Exploration Society on January 30. These people, he said, played a great part in Jewish history, but their state of civilisation remained an unsolved mystery, for of the thirty inscriptions that had been found not one could be read, though years have been spent in attempts to interpret the script. It would be interesting to know more of a people who for a thousand years lay across the bridge that separated Europe from Asia. They exercised an influence on Greek art, as might be deduced from ancient monuments, and a curious fact was that they used as a symbol the two-headed eagle, which was still the symbol of the Germanic race, but the connection between modern Germany and the people who sacked Babylon could not be traced, though German antiquaries had industriously applied themselves to the investigation of Hittite history. Dr. Hogarth hoped that excavations would eventually bring to light a key to the inscriptions in which the Hittite story was hidden.

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London, W.C.2,
Tuesday Morning.

The Government's Oil Shares.

The announcement that the Government will not dispose of the controlling interest in the Anglo-Persian Oil Company was fully expected in view of the communication addressed to Mr. Baldwin. There were many who took exception to the investment in the first place, but, whatever the view then, it is quite certain that now a great majority of the country is in favour of keeping the shares. It is now recognised, however, that the proposed deal would not have adversely affected Great Britain's position in any way. The late Government have themselves to thank for the misconception of the position, for it arose solely from their failure to give adequate information on the subject. It has been left to the Burmah Oil Company, which, it need scarcely be stated, holds the great bulk of the remainder of the ordinary shares in the Anglo-Persian Oil Company, to issue a statement explaining the position. The proposed scheme was that the shares were to be acquired by the Burmah Oil Company in such a way as would secure the British control of a new group consisting of the Burmah, the Shell, and the Royal Dutch companies.

The Proposed Preferences.

The reply of the Prime Minister to an inquiry from the Association of British Chambers of Commerce with regard to the resolutions adopted at the recent Imperial Economic Conference will go far to remove the anxiety felt as to the fate of the Preferences proposed on dried fruit and other commodities. Mr. MacDonald pointed out that Parliament is the supreme authority for deciding policy, but stated that he was "perfectly certain that whoever is responsible for the Government would never think for a moment of either diminishing from or going beyond the promises given by Ministers on those occasions." Of course, the Prime Minister cannot guarantee what Parliament may do, but it may, I think, be taken for granted that the proposed Preferences will stand.

The Recognition of Russia.

It was a foregone conclusion that one of the first acts of Mr. MacDonald's Government would be the recognition of Russia. The step had to be taken sooner or later, and in the prevailing circumstances there will be few to criticise the haste to take a concrete step in the direction of the economic recovery of Europe. The recognition is admittedly incomplete. The document, which is well worth study, is probably one of the most curious that have ever issued from a Foreign Office. But, then, in other times the problems were not so complex, and, whatever criticism may be passed, the objective of the Government leaves no loophole for reproach. It goes without saying that the restoration of normal conditions is an essential for the recovery of British trade which must take place if unemployment is to disappear and this island is to continue to support its present population, and while Russia as a market may be, and certainly is, negligible at the present time, the development of friendly relations with that country is emphatically a step in the right direction, the benefit of which we shall feel in due course.

Suez Canal Traffic.

The statistics of the Suez Canal traffic in 1923 show that the past year constitutes a landmark in the history of the canal. The traffic record was held by 1922, but the tonnage of ships passing through the canal last year was 1,986,917 tons greater than in the previous twelve months, and it is interesting to note that the figures for each of the first ten months showed an advance on the totals of the corresponding months in 1922. A survey of the figures without a knowledge of the facts would doubtless lead to the conclusion that there was a marked revival of commerce in 1923, which, as we have, unfortunately, only too good reason to know, was not the case. But while the increased traffic has no such significance, it is a sign of the trend of events, an indication of the way in which things are moving. It also suggests very forcibly the use that will be made of the canal when trade is once more pursuing its accustomed course.

The Coming Fair.

Judging by present indications, this year's British Industries Fair at the White City and Birmingham promises to be pre-eminently successful. The prospects may be gauged from the fact that 50 per cent. of the replies received to letters of invitation sent to buyers in one of the Dominions state that the Fair will be visited, while a further 20 per cent. suggest the possibility of a visit. Buyers will be present from Malta, Egypt, Syria, and the Balkans, and the Fair will offer an excellent medium for firms desirous of establishing business relations with the Near and Middle East.

Syria's Railway Scheme.

The preliminary work is now being carried out in connection with the scheme for a railway between Beyrout and Tripoli, a distance of 96 kilometres, the effect of which will be to link up Beyrout with the Baghdad line, and thus to render possible direct communication with Western Europe. It is expected that a start will be made with the construction of the railway towards the end of the summer. An extension of the line southwards from Beyrout for only a little greater distance would enable a junction with the Palestine-Egypt railways, a boon that would-be visitors to Egypt would doubtless not be slow to appreciate.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

The Manchester cotton trade review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended February 2 states :—

After the better state of things prevailing last week it has been disappointing to find that this week business has relapsed into a state of extreme dullness. Inquiry has dwindled away to comparatively small proportions, and naturally the actual transactions carried out have been on the same scale. The railway strike was of too short duration to cause any disturbance to this market, and its settlement, whilst naturally a source of much relief, had no effect on business.

Yarn.—A poor week has been experienced, and sales have been only small both in American and Egyptian, although in the latter section producers have still fairly good order lists. Quotations have not changed much, but show more irregularity. There are no further developments as yet in connection with the Control Scheme to which we referred last week. Whilst this scheme is subjected to some criticism, there seems little doubt that the bulk of the spinners of American cotton believe that it is the only thing which will provide the relief which is so needful.

Cloth.—Purchasers have been content to operate very sparingly. Most of the demand centres on goods for early delivery, the necessary confidence which would permit orders for further ahead to be placed being lacking. No individual market calls for special mention.

Raw Cotton.—There is nothing of interest to report in connection with this section. Quotations have been very steady, and are little changed as compared with last week. Closing prices yesterday were as follows :—American Fully Middling, 19.67d. ; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 23.20d.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS.

Cyprus, December 29.

Abundant rains have fallen during the week, thus considerably improving the prospects of the crop. Imports are still declining, whilst exports continue. Important shipments of carobs already sold will take place in the next three months.

Basrah, January 5.

The latest reports from Australia are not encouraging as regards dates. Those from America are not more promising. The New York market has at present a large stock of dates unsold.

Haifa, January 5.

There have been no marked fluctuations or important changes of price in the grain market.

The Bulgarian Government is prepared to pay to British bondholders the coupon No. 34 of the Four and a-Half per Cent. Loan of 1907 maturing on February 1, 1924, at francs (French) 11.25 each, and the bonds drawn for redemption on that date at francs (French) 500 each. Holders of bonds, which have been in British ownership since August 1, 1914, who are desirous of availing themselves of the offer thus made by the Bulgarian Government, should present the above-mentioned coupons and drawn bonds (to which all coupons due after the date of redemption must remain attached) for payment at the counting-house of Messrs. Stern Brothers, 6, Angel Court, E.C.2. The amount due in French francs will be paid in sterling at the sight rate of exchange on Paris on the day of presentation, less tax.

Commerce and Industry.

(Reports from Our Own Correspondents.)

ROUMANIA.

Bucharest, January 27.

Export of Cereals.

A recent law has pronounced the export of cereals, including wheat and rye, free upon payment of the export taxes fixed, as stated in last month's letter. Exporters are not yet satisfied, however, and during last week a delegation of grain merchants was received by the Minister of Industry and Commerce and presented to him a petition asking that the export tax on wheat should be reduced from 30,000 to 10,000 lei per wagon. The Minister promised to bring the demands of the delegation before the Council of Ministers at their next meeting, but it does not seem likely that so great a concession will be made.

Last Year's Crops.

The following provisional figures have been published regarding the agricultural production during the past year. The total production of wheat in the whole country, including the annexed provinces, was 40,439,254 hectolitres, as against 32,687,407 for the previous year; of rye, 3,616,444 hectolitres, as against 3,252,369; of barley, 23,712,700 hectolitres, as against 32,262,228; of oats, 20,078,756, as against 29,288,213. The maize figures have not yet been published. It will be seen that the greatest increase has been in the production of wheat, in spite of all the scare rumours which were current at the end of last year, and the rye crop has also increased. The falling off in the barley and oats crops was largely due to unfavourable weather and a rather poor harvest.

Good Autumn Sowing.

According to the figures of the Ministry of Agriculture, the following areas were sown during the past autumn:—Wheat, 1,341,378 hectares; rye, 107,361 hectares; barley, 31,783 hectares; oats, 2,919 hectares, giving a total of 1,485,796 hectares, which is stated to be more than the area sown last year. The condition of the crops is reported to be good in most districts, as, in spite of the long dry autumn, sufficient rain fell to swell and burst the seeds before the snow and frost came.

The Oil Industry.

In the Monitor Officiel of December 18 a law was published granting freedom of trade in petroleum under the following conditions:—

(1) The export of crude oil is prohibited.

(2) The export of residues is also prohibited, and an export tax of 80 bani is payable on light and heavy benzine. All other products are subject to the export taxes already in force.

(3) Petroleum companies are obliged to contract with the State railway, river, and maritime services for the supply of residues as fuel at a fixed price of 1.50 lei per kilogramme.

(4) The prices of petroleum products for the home market, loco factory, must not exceed the world price (f.o.b. Gulf of Mexico). The distribution price within the country shall be the price loco factory plus expenses of transport, wastage, storage, rent of tanks, and communal taxes, with 15 per cent. of the basic price added as profit for the producer.

(5) The requirements of the home market must have priority. The organisation of the distribution shall be under the supervision of a Government Commissioner, who will see that the provisions of this law are fulfilled—until the Government has definitely fixed the organisation of distribution for the future.

On the whole, the petroleum companies appear to be fairly well satisfied with the present regulations, although some apprehension is felt in connection with the organisation of the home distribution.

Some outcry was raised by the appearance recently of a new regulation cancelling the privilege which has been granted to the industry since the war of importing free of tax, or at a reduced rate, the materials required for the reconstruction of plant. The petroleum production has steadily increased during the last three years, in spite of the many difficulties the industry has had to cope with, and the Government has evidently decided that the time for granting facilities for reconstruction is past.

The new mining law has not yet been published, so that no indication has been given to the public of the terms upon which renewals of leases of mining lands are to be granted, or the way in which existing rights are to be protected, as promised in the Constitution.

A discovery of natural gas which may prove of some importance has been made at Aricesti, near Baicoiu, where, at No. 1 well of the Romana-Americana Company a sudden and totally unexpected eruption of gas occurred from a depth of 715 metres. The jet was exceedingly powerful, and carried with it pieces of metal of the mine shaft, the friction between which caused a fire to break out which did much damage.

The State and Commerce.

A movement is on foot, inspired by M. Tancred Constantinescu, for the "commercialisation of State enterprises." The first that was heard of it was his proposal, when still Director-General of the State Railways, for the autonomy of the railways. One of the principal points upon which he insists is that State enterprises should be placed beyond the influence of politics. The votes of the shareholders in such enterprises should, he argues, have preponderance over the vote of the State. They should elect their board of administration, and the directors should not be changed with each new Government.

The Budget.

The Budget introduced by M. Vintila Bratianu, Minister of Finance, for 1924 was passed by the Legislature on December 28. In his speech before the Chamber of Deputies M. Bratianu said that the Budget could justly claim to be a distinct improvement upon its predecessors. The total amount budgeted for is twenty-four milliards of lei, and revenue and expenditure are balanced. The following are the principal items of revenue (in millions of lei):—Direct taxation, 2,900; indirect taxation, 8,440; monopolies, 3,500; public services, 7,700—22,540.

M. Bratianu further stated that since the beginning of the year no issue of currency had been made for the use of the State by the National Bank, and the debt of the State to the bank had been reduced by nearly a milliard lei. Four-fifths of the external floating debt had been consolidated (represented by Treasury bonds), and arrangements made regarding other outstanding debts. An agreement had been come to with the French Government respecting the advance of 100 million francs which was to have been repaid in cereals (which it was not found possible to deliver), so that the only foreign floating debts not arranged for were the twenty-seven million francs owing to the Swiss Government and the Treasury bonds which had not been presented for consolidation. With regard to the consolidated foreign debt, M. Bratianu stated that Roumania had stamped and therefore recognised all the bonds belonging to allied and neutral nations. There still remains to be consolidated the debt to the Banca Nationala and three milliards of internal floating debt, which it is hoped to arrange by means of a foreign loan.

SMYRNA FRUIT MARKET.

Messrs. C. J. Giraud and Co., of Smyrna, report as follows for the week ended January 19:—

The arrivals since the opening of the season are estimated at 36,200 tons, and the sales are put at 34,200 tons. Very little fruit is now offering for sale. Although transactions have been on a small scale this week, prices have moved up sharply, apparently on forced purchases by oversold shippers. Shortage of supplies is causing waning interest in the article.

DRIED FRUIT MARKET.

Messrs. J. C. Houghton and Co., of Liverpool, report as follows for the month ended February 1:—

Currants.—The strength of the Greek market was undoubtedly the dominant factor during the period under review, and materially helped the position. The political situation at home and the unsettling influence of the railway strike have made buyers act with extreme caution, only purchasing in order to fill absolute requirements. During the last week a welcome revival has taken place, assisted to a very great extent by Continental purchases of the lower grades, and we close the month with a strong and active market. We have had no arrivals, which makes the statistical position very strong. Latest sales have been in Calamata at 45s. to 46s., Zante 48s. to 50s., Gulf 50s. to 55s., Panariti 55s. to 57s. Cleaned fruit has been keenly competed for, and is now getting very scarce. Closing quotations:—Pyrgos and Amalias, 48s. to 52s.; Gulf, 51s. to 55s.; Smalls, up to 56s. Vostizza has not participated to any appreciable extent in the advance, small fruit being in most request at 58s. to 60s., and best 63s. to 65s.; bold fruit, 61s. to 66s.; shade dried, 70s. up to 74s. for a few fine. Quotations:—Calamata, 45s. to 46s.; Zante, 48s. to 50s.; Patras, 51s. to 54s.; Gulf and Panariti, 53s. to 57s.; Vostizza, 60s. to 74s.; Cleaned Gulf and Panariti, 53s. to 56s.

Raisins.—Valencias slow, half-boxes, 43s. to 45s. (mostly for export); quarter boxes, 50s. to 55s. Australian Lexias: A further arrival per Somerset is just to hand, 2 Crowns selling at 45s.

Sultanas.—Smyrnas have been in exceedingly active demand, principally the lower qualities. An insistent export inquiry set in, and almost entirely monopolised the trade, good average quality bags selling at 50s. to 52s.; boxes good average cleaned at 54s. to 57s. Other grades have advanced in price to a lesser degree, good quality 60s. to 66s., fine fruit 70s. to 97s. 6d., and few Caraburnu 100s. Cretans are mostly withdrawn; transactions reported were 56s. to 70s. Old Greeks sold 43s. to 46s. New crop neglected. Afghans: A large business has been moving; yellows 42s. to 43s. Australians are all cleared; 2 Crowns 48s. to 50s., and 3 Crowns 52s. to 55s.

Figs.—Bags Naturals are dearer, export demand helping the position, and sales have been made from 35s. to 37s. for genuine quality.

Although oats now rank next to barley in importance, their cultivation in Tunis was unknown prior to the French occupation. They are grown in the mountainous regions of the northern part of Tunis and in the basin of the Mejerda River, the species cultivated being the so-called Algerian oats, which is able to withstand the attacks of various plant diseases. From 1895 to 1899 the mean annual area under cultivation was about 13,500 acres; by 1907 it had increased to 91,500 acres. During the period 1910-1919 the mean area was about 138,500 acres, and the average production about 49,000 metric tons. The area under cultivation in 1921 was around 158,000 acres, and the production approximated 60,000 metric tons.

Maize and sorghum, both spring-grown crops, had under cultivation in 1921 an area of 54,500 acres, which produced 9,000 metric tons. Of leguminous crops the most important is beans. The mean annual area under cultivation during 1917-1921 was about 49,500 acres. The annual exportation of beans was 8,000 metric tons in 1911, 1,000 in 1917, 10,500 in 1918, 18,000 in 1919, and 23,000 in 1921. Kidney beans, fenugreek, vetch, clover, French grass, lucerne, lupine, chick peas, and lentils also are grown to a considerable extent.

In 1881, when the French occupied Tunis, there were about 4,000 acres given over to grape culture. This area, however, grew quite rapidly under the care of the European immigrants, particularly the French and Italians, until in 1913 the extent under cultivation had reached about 43,000 acres. By 1921 there were 58,000 acres, which yielded about 4,000 metric tons of table grapes and produced 3,733,000 gallons of wine.

In production of olive oil Tunis ranks as the fourth country in the world. The main centre for olive culture is "El Sahel," lying along the east coast from Susa to Sfax. Although the area planted to olive trees actually decreased from about 889,500 acres in 1910 to 580,000 acres in 1918, the number of trees increased from 11,575,000 to 11,700,000. In 1919 the number had increased to 12,000,000, indicating the new tendency to plant the trees closer together. This method seems to yield better results, judging by the output of olive oil; production for the period 1916-1920 averaged 37,500 metric tons, as against 22,000 metric tons for the period 1910-1915; for 1920 it was about 45,000 metric tons, and for 1921 (estimated) it was between 45,000 anl 50,000 metric tons. Grafting on the wild olive is also being urged among owners as a means of increasing production. The steadily increasing olive industry of Tunis has brought about increased exportation of olive oil. This product was formerly shipped almost exclusively to Southern France (especially Marseilles) and Italy, to be "blended" there before distribution to European markets or purchase by American importers. More recently, however, European buyers have begun to obtain their supplies of oil without recourse to the Marseilles or Italian "blenders" and middlemen. Importers from the United States, having discovered the excellent qualities of Tunisian olive oil before "blending" with adulterants, such as cottonseed, peanut, and other oils, are beginning to seek stocks of pure Tunisian oil for the American market. Direct exportation to the United States was very slight up to 1921, when the amount reached about 165 metric tons of pure oil, with an additional 1,333 tons of olive-oil foots. Corresponding exports in 1922 amounted to 77 and 1,466 tons respectively. Under the Romans the cultivation of olive gardens reached as far south as Metlaoui. Following the construction of the Gafsa railroad, many of these old olive plantations are creeping back into regions deserted for centuries.

Next in economic importance to the olive is the date. There are several varieties of date palms in Tunis, but, with few exceptions their fruit may be classified in two groups—namely, the dry and the soft or pulpy. The famous "Degla" or "Deglat-En-Nour" variety belongs to the second group, and is grown practically exclusively for exportation to Europe. The principal centres of date production are the oases of Gabes and the Jerid (Tozeur, Nefta, El Oudian, El Hamma). The number of date-palm trees in 1921 was about 60,000 "Degla" and 975,000 others. The mean annual production during the period 1917-1921 was approximately 38,000 metric tons, of which 1,500 tons were "Degla." About 80 per cent. of this variety was exported, mainly to France and Italy. Of the common or dry variety, less than 4 per cent. was exported, and principally to Algeria. The "Degla" comprised 58 per cent. of the 1921 exports of dates, but only 42 per cent. of their nearly doubled exports in 1922.

The export of "Degla" dates has been going on for hundreds of years. As long ago as the eleventh century a local geographer wrote that almost every day 1,000 camels or more left Tozeur loaded with dates. The preservation of this unrivalled resource was a potent reason for the Bey's steady refusal to consider the once much-discussed French project for an "inland sea" across the "shott" region. All the date gardens of this section are watered by a carefully controlled system of irrigation, fed from springs.

On the eastern coast of Tunis are grown the various citrous fruits—oranges, mandarins, citrons, lemons, and shaddocks; also apricots, peaches, pears, pomegranates, figs, bananas, and plums in considerable quantities. Most of these fruits are consumed locally. The almond is cultivated chiefly in the gardens of Sfax, where there are about 128,000 almond trees out of a total of some 214,000 in the entire country. Some trees are found around Tunis, Grombalia, Bizerta, and Susa. In 1921 Tunis exported about 830 metric tons of almonds, mostly to France; but in 1922 the shipments dropped to 237 tons. The pistachio nut, formerly cultivated to a considerable extent in the gardens of Sfax, is rapidly disappearing.

The Fishing Industry.

The great variety of choice fish which are found along the extensive Tunisian coast line was known to the ancient Romans, whose emperors imported mullet, eel, and tuna from Tunis for their famous feasts. The fishing industry still continues very important. An indeterminate number of boats are engaged in coastwise fishing, the majority of them owned by Tunisians or Italians. During 1922 about 913 metric tons of fish were exported, valued at about 5,970,000 francs. These shipments went principally to Italy and France, except poulp, which were shipped mostly to the United States and Greece.

The most important fish caught on this coast is the tuna or tunny. It runs during May and June, coming from the west and visiting the gulfs and bays. The chief catches are made at Sidi Daoud, near Cape Bon. The catch during the year 1922 amounted to 867 metric tons, showing an increase as compared with 1920 and 1921, but a decided decrease as compared with 1919, when the catch exceeded 1,113 tons. Other fish are the sardine, anchovy, poulp, whiting, mullet, sole, lobster, shrimp, and conger eel. In addition to the coastwise fishing, the few fresh-water lakes of Tunis produce many excellent fish.

The coral beds off the north coast of Tunis and Algeria, particularly about Tabarca, have been exploited for more than 1,200 years, most of the time under concessions secured by the French. Their product, a superior red coral, is taken by the Italians, worked over into finished or semi-finished forms, and sent on to the Oriental markets, chiefly Persia and India. In 1913 Tunis imported from Italy almost equal quantities of rough and of semi-finished coral, with practically no difference in values. By 1920 and 1921, however, the trade was going to Italy as rough coral (re-exported from Algeria and Tripoli), and returning to Tunis as semi-finished product at import values that were doubled and quadrupled. In consequence the prohibition on import of luxuries confined the trade in 1922 to an import of 447 kilos of rough coral from Algeria at a value of 1,699 francs, and its re-export to Italy in the same form at a value of 178,800 francs.

Sponge fishing by natives, Italians, and Greeks is carried on along the south-eastern coast, confined mainly to the Sfax neighbourhood and the Islands of Kerkena; it constitutes the region's principal source of wealth. The mean annual production is 150 metric tons, valued at more than 5,000,000 francs. The industry was recently hard hit by a new measure prohibiting fishing with "gangave" (a special kind of net) where water is less than 20 metres deep; but, following a protest from Sfax fishers, the regulation was modified to permit use of the "gangave" in waters 15 feet deep during certain seasons and along specified parts of the coast.

ROUMANIAN DEBTS.

In the annual report of the Europe and United States Section of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce it is stated that the subject which has perhaps presented the most difficulty and occupied the greatest amount of time during the year is that relating to Roumanian debts. The report goes on to give an account of the negotiations.

Early in the year a delegation visited this country representing the Roumanian post-war debtors. The object of the visit was to arrange some solution of the difficulties which were facing the debtors in meeting the full amount of their liabilities. It was understood that although the Roumanian Government were not officially connected with the delegation, they were prepared to introduce legislation at a later date on the basis of any agreement which was reached with British creditors. Negotiations with the creditors were commenced, and proved to be of a difficult nature in view of the conditions prevailing in Roumania.

The Executive, on behalf of Manchester creditors, felt it desirable to organise the creditors in the North of England, chiefly Bradford, Nottingham, Huddersfield, and Glasgow, into one joint committee, in order to co-ordinate the endeavours to secure satisfactory terms. The London creditors also had an organisation, and, as far as possible, these two bodies co-operated in their mutual interests. Unfortunately, the negotiations terminated in a manner not entirely satisfactory to the British creditors. It was found impossible to secure from the Roumanian delegates any better terms of payment than in a period approximating to twenty years. Further, owing to divergencies of opinion on minor details, two agreements were signed for the settlement of British debts, one in London and one in Manchester. In pursuance of the policy intimated at the outset by the Roumanian Government, a Law was introduced in that country on June 3 purporting to give effect to the British agreements. It was found, however, that this was not so, and that on various important issues the law did not carry out the agreed terms. Further representations were instituted, which finally resulted in an official intimation being given by the representatives of the Roumanian Government to the effect that a further law would be adopted at a later date, which would provide that the law of June 3 should be interpreted in the terms of the British agreements.

The question of the payment of post-war debts may be said to have been settled as satisfactorily as circumstances would permit, and many British firms are now in communication with the official body set up in Bucharest to carry out the arrangements.

The Roumanian delegates who visited this country stated that they were not empowered to consider the question of the payment of debts contracted prior to the Armistice, the attitude being maintained that pre-war debts were in an entirely different position compared with post-war debts. A clause, however, was incorporated in the Post-War Debt Agreement intimating that within six months of its ratification the Roumanian Government would provide an equitable settlement of pre-war debts. The Roumanian Law passed on June 3 definitely provided for a settlement of these debts, but the actual provisions were seen to be entirely unsatisfactory from the creditors' point of view. This was pointed out to the Roumanian Minister, and negotiations were reopened with a view to securing an equitable settlement as provided for.

In November a further delegation visited this country, representing the pre-war debtors, and the whole question was very thoroughly discussed in London. During these negotiations the Manchester Committee had the advantage of the co-operation of the London Creditors' Committee, and their thanks are due to the Chairman of that committee, Mr. W. T. Suren, for the great amount of work which he has performed on behalf of the interests of the British creditors. Unfortunately, nothing of a favourable nature resulted from these negotiations, which were still proceeding at the end of the year. At the last meeting held in December, an invitation was extended to the Roumanian Minister and the delegates to visit Manchester and discuss the position. Developments, therefore, are anticipated early in the New Year.

Serbian Pre-War Debts.

The report goes on to deal with the position with regard to Serbian pre-War debts:—

Considerable concern was caused amongst members of the section interested in trade with Serbia, by the attitude adopted by the Yugoslav Government towards the payment of pre-war debts. Early in the spring a Decree became effective whereby Serbian debtors were allowed to pay the creditors at the rate of exchange of 25.10 dinars to the £ sterling for their pre-war outstandings. Creditors had received intimation from some of their debtors that they were taking advantage of this action of the Yugoslav Government, and were paying into the Belgrade Commercial Tribunal the sum referred to for every £ sterling of their debt, and by so doing were discharging their indebtedness to the creditors. This payment represented only about 6 per cent. of the original debt, and in addition involved a total loss of all interest for nine years.

At a meeting held in May the creditors decided to address a strong letter to the Foreign Office and the Board of Trade, in an endeavour to secure energetic steps being undertaken by the British Government. Unfortunately, the representations made by the Foreign Office did not have any beneficial result.

The matter will not be allowed to rest, and the hope is still cherished that Yugoslavia will realise that to persevere in a policy of repudiation will permanently destroy the credit and prestige of the country. If that realisation can be brought home to Yugoslavia, surely in her own interests she will return to her traditional policy of honesty and fair dealing.

Mr. H. B. Heath Eves has been elected to a seat on the board of the Anglo-Persian Oil Company, Ltd.

The Bulgarian Legation announces that, following a decision of the Bulgarian National Bank, all holders of Bulgarian banknotes hitherto in circulation must exchange them not later than April 15 next for the new type of notes which has just been issued. After the above date the old banknotes will be cancelled, and no claim for refundment will be entertained. The exchange will take place at the offices of the Bulgarian National Bank.

ROUMANIA'S FINANCES.

Budget Estimates, and Public Debt.

The British Commercial Secretary at Bucharest has prepared the following memorandum on the Roumanian Budget Estimates for 1924. It will be seen that it is proposed to balance receipts and expenditure at 24,000,000,000 lei.

Receipts.

The yield of direct taxes is estimated at 2,990 millions, which, on a twelve-monthly period, is an increase of nearly 50 per cent. on the estimates for the nine months' Budget of 1923. In his report on the Budget Estimates the Minister of Finance explains this large increase in the estimated yield by the statement that during the last nine months the taxing commissions have been extremely busy, and for this period had not finished the valuations necessary for the levying of the taxes. He states that in the months of September and October of 1923 the encashments reached 200 million lei per month (detailed figures give 221 million for the month of September, and 215 million for the month of October), and they only include 75 per cent. of the amount which should have been collected under this head.

The indirect taxes are estimated to yield 8,445 millions. Nearly half of this total—4,000 millions is itemised as export taxes. The estimate is given as probably under the resulting receipts, for during the first six months of the Budget period 1923—April to September—the receipts are given as 1,905 millions. The export taxes are now collected in pounds sterling and the moneys thus handled are apparently transferred both into and out of the Roumanian Treasury at the rates of exchange officially fixed for the payment of these taxes. Thus the receipts are estimated in lei at the same rate of exchange as payments abroad on the consolidation, and other external loans.

The revenue from the State monopolies is estimated at 3,430 millions. In October, 1923, the encashments are given as 305 millions; those for September as 249 millions, and those for August at 262 millions.

The receipts of the Ministry of Communications are given as 5,191 millions. This includes 4,000 million estimated yield of the State railroads. The receipts for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1923, are given as 2,045 millions, and those for the seven months beginning April 1, 1923, at 1,999 millions. The estimates for 1924 are based upon the receipts for the last two months before the preparation of the Budget Estimates. In September, 1923, the receipts are given as 313 millions.

The revenues of the Ministry of Industry and Commerce are estimated at 641 millions. This includes an estimated quantity of 8,000 wagons (80,000 tons) of crude oil coming to the State as royalties, and mining taxes. For the purpose of the Estimates the price of the oil is taken as 2,600 lei per ton. The amount under this heading reaches 208 millions of the total for the Ministry. 395 millions are given as the estimated yield from the metal industries and mines belonging to the State.

Expenditure.

(1) The Ministry of War.—The estimate of 3,575 millions is stated to be for the ordinary maintenance during 1924 of an effective of 125,000 men, and shows an increase for a normal twelve-monthly period over the preceding estimates of nearly 500 millions. Some 90 millions of supplementary credits were, however, voted for the Army during the nine monthly period of 1923, so that the increase of 500 millions is not the real difference between the estimated expenditure over the two periods. The aviation branch of the Army gets an increase of nearly 35 millions of lei.

(2) The Ministry of Finance.—The increase in the 1924 Estimates of 1,360 millions over the 1923 Estimates (taken as 12 months) is explained by the increase in the Public Debt, by the charges contingent upon the amortisation of the stamped internal and external rentes which is now restarted for the first time since 1916, by the payment of the amortisation on the priority loan of £2,500,000 (1922), and by the payment of the interest on the rentes given in payment of the agricultural lands expropriated. It is stated that these agricultural land rentes will, in the course of the year 1924, be emitted up to 11,000 millions.

The monopoly administration gets an increased estimated expenditure of nearly 400 millions for machines and installations necessary.

Revenue in Millions of Lei.—Direct taxes, 2,990; indirect taxes, 8,445; stamp and registration fees, 1,411.4; State monopolies, 3,430.5; State domains, 415.7; subventions, 37.4; Ministry of Finance, 1,020.2; Interior, 51.5; Justice, 55.6; Foreign Affairs, 75; Agriculture and Domains, 33.4; Industry and Commerce, 641.9; War, 20.3; Public Works, 1.7; Education, Arts, and Worship, 59.8; Communications, 5,191.7; Labour, Public Health, and Welfare, 118.9—total, 24,000.

Expenditure in Millions of Lei.—Ministry of War, 3,574.7; Finance, 6,750.2; Education, 1,844.9; Arts and Worship, 445.6; Interior, 1,094.5; Public Works, 280.7; Justice, 425.5; Communications, 6,212.7; Agriculture and Domains, 625.9; Industry and Commerce, 396; Foreign Affairs, 139.6; Public Health and Social Welfare, 753.2; Labour, etc., 85.1; Presidency of the Council of Ministers, 2.6—total, 22,642.2; for repairs to rolling stock, Roumanian State Railways, 300; increased allowances to employees and pensioners, 550; fund for opening of supplementary and extraordinary credits, 507.8—total, 24,000.

The Commercial Secretary has also forwarded particulars of the Roumanian Public Debt, basing his statement on the Finance Minister's report to the Chamber of Deputies.

The following table shows the position in regard to the principal external debts, consolidated under the scheme of 1922 :—

	Treasury Bonds Overdue Jan., 1922.	Amount acceptable for consolidation.	Amount received for consolidation
	(Thousands Omitted.)
Pounds sterling	10,800	9,761	9,556
Dollars	32,137	25,773	25,280
French francs	243,017	181,219	190,452

Escudos	941	941	941
Swedish crowns.....	6,246	6,246	6,246
Belgian francs	40,183	1,212	1,139

The figures in the first column include certain debts—e.g., those owing to foreign governments—to which the consolidation scheme did not apply.

In addition to the above, there is the 1922 Priority Loan of £2,500,000 and a sum of £1,102,652 which has been given in bonds to British and French landowners in Bessarabia as compensation for the expropriation of their agricultural lands. Other sums owing to foreign companies for railroad supplies and repairs were paid in the form of consolidation bonds.

There are also the loans of 100 million French francs from the French Government and of 40 million Swiss francs from the Swiss Government. The repayment of these amounts was to be made in cereals exported by the Roumanian Government. According to the report of the Minister of Finance, freedom of commerce makes it impossible for Roumania to carry out this intention, and proposals have, therefore, been made to the respective governments to transform these debts into debts repayable over a number of years. The Minister of Finance expressed the belief that in a short time he will be able to reach an agreement with the French Government along these lines, and concludes, therefore, that apart from the Swiss loan, of which there still remains owing 27 million Swiss francs, and the Treasury Bonds which have not come forward for consolidation, the entire floating external debt may be considered as consolidated.

As regards the Treasury Bonds which have not been put forward for consolidation, the Minister states that provision has been made in the budget for 1924 to pay interest on these at the rate of 4 per cent. This is the same as the interest paid on the Consolidation Loan, and the Minister says it is impossible to give those debts better terms than those given for consolidation.

There is also the old external consolidated debt of Roumania, the capital amount remaining to be paid after the stamping operations carried out by the various Roumanian commissions being given at 550 million French francs. This sum is stated to be the Roumanian capital debt owing on the whole of the "rentes" emitted abroad from 1889 to 1913. The report goes on to state that the Roumanian Government has stamped, and therefore recognised, all the external consolidated debt in the hands of the citizens of allied and neutral States.

It will be seen that this part of the external debt is given in French francs, although the terms of emission for the different loans vary. The 1913 Loan, for instance, apparently entitled holders to claim interest and amortisation in gold. The definite settlement of this question remains for the future, but in the meantime it will be seen that the Minister of Finance assesses the interest on the debt as being payable in French francs.

The consolidated internal debt amounts to 16,892,200,000 lei and the internal floating debt to a further 14,561,000,000 lei. In addition to the above, the following amounts are given as owing on January 1, 1924:—Boussac, £41,414; Relief Bonds, £139,305; Skoda, 53,690,986 Czech crowns; Ringhoffer, 17,767,278 Czech crowns: Compagnie Francaise du Levant, 17,640,000 French francs; Kahn et Kahn, 1,500,000 French francs; Banca Commerciala, 972,122 French francs; Belgian Loans, 5,652,500 French francs: Debts to Italian Government, 2,460,010 lire; Bank of Italy, 730,865 lire, 80,000 dollars.

The approximate amounts given as the total of inter-Allied debts due to other governments as a consequence of the war are:—France, 1,106,072,000 French francs; Great Britain, £23,000,000; United States of America, 38,000,000 dollars; Italy, 151,000,000 lire; Belgium, 24,000,000 Belgian francs. Apart from these inter-Allied debts, there are the obligations falling upon Roumania under the Peace Treaties. These include:—

(1) The Roumanian quota of the Austro-Hungarian and of the Russian pre-war public debts;

(2) The value of the property belonging to the Austrian and Hungarian States taken over in the newly-acquired territories. The Roumanian valuation of these properties amounts to 1,104 million gold crowns, but the Austro-Hungarian valuation is stated to be three times as high.

(3) Property belonging to the Russian Government taken over in the newly-acquired territories.

(4) The amount due to private citizens in Roumania on account of war damages, etc.

On the other hand, Roumania has claims for reparations under the Treaties, and claims approximating to £10,000,000 for damage done to the Roumanian petroleum fields and refineries in 1916, as well as a special claim on Germany for repayment of the currency issue of 2,173,000,000 lei made during the German occupation of Wallachia.

Cotton and Cotton Goods.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Egyptian Steady.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson, of Liverpool, report as follows for the week ended January 30:—

Egyptian Spot.—Prices have remained very steady since our last report, and a fair business has taken place. No buying enthusiasm has been in evidence, however, and at the moment it would appear that present conditions are likely to continue for a while. Alexandria has remained consistently firm as regards offerings of c.i.f. cotton, and with the present differences ruling such offers are not attractive. There is now a large general stock of cotton in Liverpool, much of it consisting of merchants' cotton imported earlier in the season on a more or less favourable basis, and spinners are quite content to satisfy their immediate requirements by buying from this source. The large discounts prevailing in the distant American crop positions stand out as a deterrent against forward commitments, although the statistical position of Egyptians continues to grow stronger and stronger. However, the pinch has not yet been felt, and it will only be when the Liverpool stock begins to show a shrinkage that the real situation will make itself felt. In the meantime, we seem to be going through a "slack" period.

Sakellaridis has met with the usual inquiry "50 to 100 on," and a small but encouraging business has taken place in Good to Fine cotton. Fully Good Sakellaridis has changed hands at 24½d. per lb. The Continent has been in the market in a quiet way; and an increased inquiry for "Low" cotton has made its appearance. There is a considerable quantity of this cotton being pressed for sale at between 15.00d. and 17.00d., but buyers are scarce. In Uppers the basis, generally speaking, still tends to harden, not so much on account of actual business doing, but rather in response to "scarcity cables" from Alexandria. Nevertheless, the market for this cotton is still irregular, and here and there an easy seller is met with. Strict F.G.F. Uppers can be bought at about 25 off March contracts to-day, and a small lot of Extra Uppers changed hands at 20 points on March.

Brown and White cottons have been comparatively neglected, but a much better business has taken place in White Sudan cotton. Manchester reports, until to-day, have made quite cheerful reading, but the latest one is not inclined to be quite so optimistic in tone. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending 25th inst. have been returned as 7,871 bales. Estimated sales 2,200 bales Egypt and 750 bales Sudan. Quotations show an advance of 10 points all round. F.G.F. Sakellaridis to-day 23.30d.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Position Practically Unchanged.

The Alexandria Commercial Company, in their report for the week ended January 25, state:—Since our last report the futures market has again been quiet, but the tone has slightly improved. The general position remains more or less the same. The trade is buying very little, and speculators are not inclined to take views on the market. The publication of the American ginners' report on 23rd inst., with the figure of 9,946,000 bales against 9,648,000 bales same date last year, has not attracted much interest, this figure being more or less anticipated. Egyptians in Liverpool have been somewhat more active, the reason being that that market is now much cheaper in comparison with Alexandria, and naturally whatever demand exists goes to the former. At the third January tender 4,250 krs. dockets were issued. January, during the last session at which it was quoted, was worth more than March, and, as we said in our last week's report, the explanation of its strength must be found in the fact that spot cotton, Sakel round fully good fair, is very strongly held, and has of late fetched a substantial premium over contract price. Ashmouni has been a very narrow market, and orders of any importance affected it abnormally. Although we consider that the present difference with Sakel is too small and not corresponding to the intrinsic value of the two varieties, there is still rather a better demand for Ashmouni than Sakel in proportion to the size of the crops. America has bought so far much less Ashmouni than last year, but the Continent has been all along a steady buyer, and the quantities now offered on the market are very small. The week's arrivals amount to 119,578 krs. against exports 206,750 krs. The stock stands at 1,915,306 krs. Spot: We have had a fair week's business at Minet el Bassal, and sales amount to about 16,450 bales, of which we estimate 9,300 B/s Sakel, 7,000 B/s uppers. 100 B/s brown and pilion, and 50 B/s white. There has as yet been no improvement in the demand from abroad, which continues on moderate lines. Arrivals have been rather larger this week, and exports continue good. The stock shows a decrease, and is now under 2,000,000 krs.

Sakellarides.—All grades have been dealt in, though the bulk of the business has been in the medium qualities. Prices of spot against contracts are without much change, except fair, which is rather dearer.

Uppers.—Business has been done in all styles. Prices of spot against contracts are generally rather dearer, except for fully fair and fully good fair, which are a little easier.

Brown and Pilion.—A moderate business has been done. Prices of spot against contracts are unchanged.

White.—A retail business has been done. Prices of spot against contracts are without change.

The Crop.—The decree restricting the acreage to be planted under cotton to one-third of the land owned will not be in force this season, and as a consequence it is quite probable that this year's acreage will be larger than that of last year. As regards the water supply during the summer months, the Sudan gauges are at present rather better than at the same time last season; nevertheless, it is yet too early to make any definite statement on the subject.

COMPANY NOTES AND REPORTS.

Steaua Romana (British).

Steaua Romana (British), Ltd., are advised that the production of Steaua Romana Well No. 246 at Runcu, which recently came into production and gave every indication of being a very productive one, has now fallen to a little less than fifty tons a day. It is presumed that sand is responsible for this decline in production. In addition to this well, however, the Steaua Romana have two other promising wells in the Runcu field. One, after two very violent eruptions which damaged the well, sanded up. Steps are being taken to repair the damage, and in the meantime a production of forty tons per day is obtained by baling. The other is expected shortly to be brought into production with good results.

Sir Louis Kershaw, Secretary of the Industries and Overseas Department, India Office, has been appointed to the vacant Assistant Under-Secretaryship of State, in charge of the financial, industrial, and overseas branches of the work.

Notwithstanding reticence in official circles (says Reuter's Athens correspondent in a message dated January 29), there is reason to believe that the Greek Government has decided in principle to establish commercial relations with the Soviet Russian Government, and the Greek Minister in Berlin has been instructed to sound the Soviet representatives in that capital on the subject.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Situation in Greece.

The resignation of M. Venizelos has been followed by the formation of a Cabinet by M. Kaphandaris, who was Minister of Justice in the previous Government. The new Prime Minister has not been able to retain the services of all his former colleagues. Those who have refused to remain in the Ministry are supposed to hold extremist views on the subject of a republican régime for Greece; but, as the whole Cabinet appears to be tinged with similar views, personal considerations probably determined the attitude of the outgoing Ministers. Although M. Kaphandaris has undertaken to carry out M. Venizelos's policy, his decision to hasten on the plebiscite on the future status of Greece constitutes an important departure from that policy. M. Venizelos, however, has given the new Government his blessing. According to present plans, he remains on in Greece, and was to attend the Chamber to record his vote on the new Ministry's motion of confidence. Everything points to a "landslide" in favour of a republic; unless the Royalists, who have known how to lie low before in similar circumstances, are preparing to spring another surprise on the politicians of Athens. It is still believed by a number of Greeks that only by getting rid of their dynasty can they hope to rehabilitate their country in the eyes of Europe. There could be no greater mistake. The British and French Governments of the day had a quarrel with King Constantine on certain definite issues. We have no means of gauging the opinion of France on the subject, but there can be no doubt that the prospect of a Greek Republic is viewed in Britain without the least enthusiasm. With his personal predilection for a Republic, it is, perhaps, too much to expect of M. Venizelos that he should explain to his countrymen that the beaux yeux of Great Britain are not going to be won by the proposed constitutional change. Greece is heading for a dangerous experiment, and fresh disappointments may well be in store for her before she can hope to be properly through with it.

Angora and Constantinople.

Any step calculated to assist Angora and Constantinople to see eye to eye with one another should prove helpful to Turkey. In receiving at Smyrna the editors of the Constantinople newspapers Mustapha Kemal Pasha had an opportunity of submitting the Angora point of view; whether at the same time he was able to learn much himself of the Constantinople point of view is not clearly established. He seems, however, to have impressed the journalists, and, as a result, there should be less friction between the two towns. The chief characteristic of the Angora régime remains—its lack of conciliatoriness. An order has now been enforced in Smyrna which can hardly be unconnected with the President's visit, compelling all business houses and shops to remain closed for twenty-four hours on Fridays. A day of rest in the week is valuable both on religious and on hygienic grounds; but, in view of the fact that the prosperity of Smyrna has been built up by non-Moslems, and that the trade of the port is, or was, almost exclusively in non-Moslem hands, it would be thought that the authorities, in enforcing a day of rest, would have left it optional to the individual business man whether he chose Fridays or Sundays. If in the minds of the authorities there existed the belief that Sundays would inevitably be chosen, the enforcement of Fridays becomes the more arbitrary, and serves only to emphasise the lack of confidence in itself and the justice of its cause that has so far been such a conspicuous feature of the new Republic.

Towards Political Peace.

A conciliatory attitude on the part of the Turkish Cabinet would seem to be necessary not only towards foreigners, but also towards those Turks who have hitherto not been prepared to endorse every point in Angora's policy. It is gradually being recognised by the Turks themselves that an Asia Minor without Greeks is an almost unworkable proposition; the Government, however, has been slower in realising how its reform efforts are handicapped by its refusal to enlist the help in the public service of experienced Unionists. Something in the nature of a rapprochement between the more moderate among the latter and Mustapha Kemal Pasha is anticipated in some quarters as the ultimate outcome of the meeting between the President and the Constantinople editors. There is talk of the President visiting Constantinople in May, by which time a working agreement would presumably have been arranged. From what is known of the prominent Unionists, such a rapprochement would entail considerable modification of Angora's present policy, and Turkey would accordingly stand to benefit in more ways than one.

Yugoslavia and the Fiume Treaty.

A Parliamentary Commission in Yugoslavia has secured only a majority of one (eleven votes to ten) for the ratification of the Agreement with Italy in regard to Fiume. The Croatian Peasant Party, which, under the advice of M. Raditch, has hitherto held aloof from the Skupshtina, now proposes to join forces with the Opposition with a view to defeating the Pashitch Government on the question of the treaty, or at least to forcing new elections on the country. It is unfortunate that on a point of such vital importance to Yugoslavia as an amicable settlement with Italy there should not be a greater measure of agreement. M. Raditch, however, will have to produce far more substantial arguments than he has yet done in support of his case to convince anyone outside his own country that a perpetuation of the feud with Italy would be preferable to the present treaty. References to Italian trickery and secret pacts are too reminiscent of his facile habit of levelling accusations without adducing proofs to impress anyone acquainted with political methods of controversy in the Balkans. There may be weak points in the pact of friendship between Italy and Yugoslavia, but something more than an unsupported charge by M. Raditch will be needed to induce anyone to believe that a Yugoslav Government has enlisted Italian help against its own Croat subjects.

Indian Politics.

The most interesting of recent political developments at Delhi is the formation of a new bloc, which, according to the Indian fashion, is called a party, having on paper a majority in the Legislative Assembly, and being consequently in a position to "refuse supplies," or, in other words, to force the Viceroy to certify the Budget, if its demand for a revision of the Constitution is not granted. The interaction between the Extremists and the Independents, who are now allied to them, is certain to be worth watching, and may prove to be of real importance. The alliance is governed, again on paper, by precise terms, and, if the figures have been cabled correctly, we gather that the Extremists cannot adopt wrecking tactics without the consent of at least one-third of the Independents, who, if they act up to their label, may thus dominate the bloc. There is obviously room in such an arrangement for plenty of practical politics in the Western sense of the term, and we are already a long way from the pure doctrine of non-co-operation as it was preached, and practised, three years ago: the curt "I won't play" is replaced by a demand that the rules of the game should be altered: and, after all, Indians are, politically, still very young.

Where India is Unanimous.

It is, however, well to recognise that the new bloc represents educated Indian opinion most effectively on some very important questions, notably those which concern the position of Indians in Africa. This practical unanimity was clearly brought out by the vote of the Assembly in favour of penalising the South African coal which is at present so largely consumed in Bombay. From the economic standpoint that is a very dubious proposition indeed, and it is noticeable that the natural position of producers and consumers was reversed in the debate, Indian consumers clamouring for dear coal, while English producers welcomed subsidised competition with what they have to sell. The explanation is that the Bombay representatives are sufficiently angry with South Africa to ask other people to pay for their spite, and they are supported by sentiment in practically every part of India. On the other side, South Africa is equally determined, for on the day before the Indian debate General Hertzog had formally endorsed the attitude taken up by General Smuts on the Asiatic question, so that there is, unhappily, no immediate prospect of an improvement in relations between the two countries.

The Release of Mr. Gandhi.

Some of our contemporaries have manifested an inclination to treat the release of Mr. Gandhi as a political move, but it is more properly regarded as an incident of humane penal administration. When the doctors prescribe for a prisoner a prolonged period of convalescence at the seaside, and the prison organisation does not offer the required accommodation, release is so obviously the proper course that to look for other motives is surely unnecessary. The political effect is another question, and one on which we are not inclined to prophesy. In the North at least the popular cult of the Gujarat saint has waned almost as rapidly as it grew, but its revival is a possibility which cannot be left out of account. In the first public expression of his views, Mr. Gandhi has given evidence of a wider and saner outlook than he formerly exhibited, and, if its maintenance could be counted on, there would be grounds for hoping that his influence would be used for the permanent good of India; but in the past his actions have been governed by the impulsiveness which is the special characteristic of his race, and for the present he must be regarded as one of the imponderable forces in Indian national life.

THE ORDER OF THE NILE.

The King has granted permission to wear the following decorations of the Order of the Nile conferred by the King of Egypt in recognition of valuable services rendered:—

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

Parliamentary Prospects.

Parliament opens to-day, and speculation is very rife on the chances of the Government's staying in any length of time. Some people give it six months, some less; others appear to think that it will last five years. Of the two, I should think, because of the appalling lack of conviction of the opposition to Labour, that the latter is nearer the truth.

So far the impression that the Government has made is favourable. With the exception of the agreeing with the Poplar people—it is difficult to see what else could have been done—the actions of the Government have been as dignified as one would expect from a one-man show. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald is making his personality felt throughout all the Ministries, but there seems to be little doubt that his present burden is too great for him to carry very long.

Mr. Lloyd George Again.

The silence that is deservedly shrouding the activities of Mr. Lloyd George was miserably broken last week with the publication of Mr. Harold Spender's interview with him on the subject of the Rhineland. It would appear that the ex-Premier did not say what he is reported to have said, but in any case it does not greatly matter. If Mr. Lloyd George was not in 1919 in favour of occupying the Rhine provinces, all that need be said is that he ought to have been! He certainly will not now gain esteem for having once possessed political foresight, and no attempts to foist his past merits on the British public are in the least likely to succeed.

The more serious aspect of the matter, however, concerns, not Mr. Lloyd George, but the British Government. Our present Foreign Secretary was perturbed by the reported case against certain French statesmen, and has done all in his power to smoothe the unfortunate affair over. The Press has been told that the whole business is closed—which means that the Government does not want the matter to be any further thrashed out. Perhaps that is the best policy; after all, any further investigation could only redound to the discredit of Mr. Lloyd George, and there is no point in shooting at wounded rabbits.

The Conservatives' Plight.

Pity should be extended to the present plight of the Conservative Party, if only on account of the fact that they once were great. Here they are, throwing over their policy of Protection on the mere pretext that the country recently rejected it. And, too, they are keeping as leader the very man who tried to plant this policy on the unwilling land. It is quite painful to witness, this hasty unloading, on grounds of expediency, of a policy which, right or wrong, was presumably an ideal of the major portion of the party.

The Conservatives are every whit in as pitiful a plight as the Liberals; they have no constructive policy, no ideals, no ideas even. They murmur despairingly the names of Disraeli, Temperance, and so on, and as they borrow from their own past or somebody's else present, so the degree of their intellectual poverty may be imagined. More and more one is realising that the Labour Party came into power owing to the weakness of their opponents.

As for the reunion of the Conservatives, that may be taken with at least as much salt as one swallowed the Liberal reunion with. True reunion will not come until all the members of Mr. Lloyd George's Coalition have retired from politics. Somehow or other, one simply cannot believe in the sincerity of their present sacrifices.

Bankers and the Government.

Nothing has reconciled the country to the Labour Government so much as the recent speeches made at the meetings of the big banks. In close succession, the heads of such important concerns as the Midland, the N.U.P., the Westminster, Lloyds, Liverpool and Martins, and so on, have testified to the soundness of England's financial position. For it is true that if the pound is in a satisfactory state, the Englishman does not greatly mind who is in power. It is also true that the banks seem to be able to make a good thing of any situation!

The Honours List.

There are many excellent things to be said for Mr. Baldwin's Honours List: it is as short and to the point as was the ex-Premier himself. But it would not appear from it that Mr. Baldwin found many new and worthy men to support him: most of the names bear a Die-hard significance. When one looks at these names, indeed, one marvels at the moderation of the late Conservative policy, and the only explanation one can think of for the essential weakness of 1923 does not redound to the credit of Mr. Baldwin.

Wild Wales and the Gipsy.

For long, of course, the gipsy has been a worse bane to the farmer than the crow, the rat, and the fox. But until the present time the unfortunate farmer has had to deal with his pest single-handed, or at best in co-operation with his local community only. Now, however, the National Farmers' Union is opening real war against the gipsies, and in Wales the fight has already begun. In Montgomeryshire evidence is being collected that the gipsy exists on stealing and begging, and a petition is to be put before Parliament that he should, therefore, have provided for him some special punitive legislation.

This disappearance of the gipsy, if it is ever legally enforced, will not now raise the outcry that would certainly have greeted it in the last century. There are, I believe, no genuine gipsies in England now, except, possibly, in Cheshire and neighbouring parts. Most of the English gipsies have migrated to America or have become civilised: among the wanderers of the roads that one meets nowadays there are few that can speak Romany.

One will hardly withhold sympathy from the farmers, then, in their attempts to efface the lazy impostors from our countryside.

Air Mails.

The report of the Air Mails Committee, which was issued last week, is scarcely encouraging reading for those who hoped that the recently projected increase in our Air strength was, in fact, for commercial purposes. The report practically says that, except for long distances, the carrying of mails by air is a "wash-out." For commercial flying within the British Isles there is no scope, so that our fleet to be used in self-defence may just as well be recognised for what it is. But efforts for long-distance flying with the airship are to be persevered with.

Conversations with Rome.

The Archbishop is being very heavily censured for permitting the Conference of Malines to be held, not only by the journalists, who naturally know more about the matter than the Archbishop, but also by those rival possessors of omniscience, the politicians. During the past few days these anti-Rome people have been unburdening their consciences, with the result that the Head of the Church of England has had perforce to divide the commentators on the conference of Malines into three classes—those who approve, those who misconceive the position, and those who are alarmed at "anything which looks to them like an approach towards friendship with the Church of Rome."

Theoretically, the Archbishop seems to have a good case; but there is no doubting the genuineness of the opposition to his actions. He, indeed, realises this, and had to water down his position by saying that the negotiations were only feelers. He is not like his flock, the majority of which loves to repeat its insuperable formula, that Rome will never make any concession, and that they are, therefore, "not having any." The Englishman will not readily give up anything for the mere sake of logic, and if there is to be no compromise, he will jolly well see that there are to be no negotiations either.

The Vienna Opera Company.

The visit of the Vienna State Opera Company has been so often postponed that the latest denial that it intends to come to us in the spring will be received with a certain amount of incredulity. Undoubtedly the visit at the same time as the Empire Exhibition would be a sarcastic comment on the management of our home entertainments. To the Viennese themselves there is no opposition: it is merely that they propose to come at a time when all our thoughts are supposed to be on things Imperial. There is, further, a feeling that it would be rather hard on the British National Opera Company to deprive them of the use of Covent Garden just when there are to be thousands of extra English-speaking visitors to London. Several weighty letters have been written to the Press in this sense. We are not chauvinistic, and we do not think that the British company reaches perfection; it is rather that our sense of fair play is in danger of being offended by the coming of the Viennese.

ENGLAND AND ROME.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—"Alter Ego," in discussing "the average Englishman's attitude towards the Catholic Church" (meaning the Church of Rome) in THE NEAR EAST for the 3rd inst. (pp. 3 and 4) makes some statements which are greatly open to question.

"The average Englishman knows that his own Church, to which he is supposed to belong, is but a few hundred years old." Let it be granted that the average Englishman is supposed to belong to the Church of England, though, as a matter of fact, many disclaim membership in its communion. To say that he "knows" that Church to be only "a few hundred years old" is a mistake. In his opinion its existence may date only from 1534, but opinion is not the same as knowledge. In this case, the opinion is erroneous. The Church of England is a reformed Church. It must have been in existence before it was reformed. Its existence dates from a long time before the reign of Henry VIII.—in fact, from the closing years of the sixth century.

Your correspondent suggests that the statement that "this country rejected Roman claims at the time of the Reformation" is deceptive, because "the policy of the Tudors was political and not religious." Whatever may be said of the policy of Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Elizabeth, I submit that considerations of a religious character did enter into the rejection of Roman claims by the great majority of their subjects. The Acts of Parliament passed in the years 1533, 1534, 1535, with regard to annates, appeals, and Royal Supremacy, and the third clause of the thirty-seventh Article of Religion show that England did reject Roman claims at the time of the Reformation.

I am not sure that the explanation your correspondent gives of English anti-papalism applies all round, to all sorts and conditions of Englishmen. If profound distrust is excited in the English mind by organisation in religion, why is it not excited by organisation in other matters? There are some, for whom Socialism, of one sort or another, is their religion. Do they refrain themselves from organising their activities to maintain and extend the influence of their political and social doctrines and enthusiasms? The explanation of the prevalence of anti-papalism in England seems rather to be that, to a great extent at any rate, it is a survival of the persuasion that one could not both be a Papist and a loyal subject of the Crown. Nowadays, the thought of the Nation has taken the place of the Crown, but the result in practice is the same. The Pope is a foreigner, and as such is regarded by the generality of English folk as one who has no right to make or meddle in any of their concerns.

It is not to be expected that anything of the nature of an appreciable advance towards reunion between England and the Papacy will be effected by the conferences at Malines, or any conferences held anywhere for a very long time to come—if ever. For a' that, an' for a' that, I do not see that the Archbishop of Canterbury has done anything worthy of censure or ridicule.—I am, etc.,

H. T. F. DUCKWORTH.

Kyrenia, Cyprus, January 19, 1924.

["Alter Ego" writes: "I have no space, unfortunately, to enter here upon the very old controversy over the date of the creation of the Anglican Church, and can, in spite of the well-known arguments—and, of course, they are arguments, interpretations of facts—which my correspondent brings forward, but repeat that "the average Englishman's" quest of knowledge in this matter is satisfied by his inability to see any resemblance between the Church operating in England in, say, 1600, and that in, say, 1500.

Anti-papalism once existed on the feeling of potential disloyalty among Catholics, but that is not its basis now. No one who knows the record of English Catholics during the War, or who founds his views of Catholics upon personal knowledge, could even pretend that they are disloyal.]

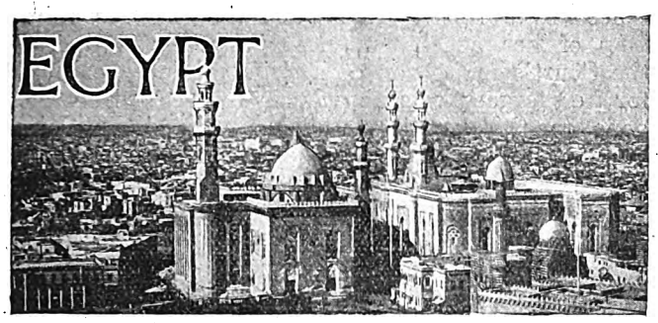
The Near and Middle East.*

From Our Own Correspondents.



Cairo, February 3.

A Popular Ministry.

Never has an Egyptian Ministry been so generally welcomed as that under Saad Pasha Zaghloul, which has just taken office. The public has shown its joy by three days of street processions and deputations to the Premier, while the whole of the local Press—Arabic, French, English, Italian, Greek, and Armenian—has been unanimously cordial. Even the Siyassa, the organ of the Liberal Constitutionals, has, for the moment, ceased from troubling, while the Nationalists also are—in their case compulsorily—at rest, their last remaining mouthpiece, the Lewa, being still suspended. Now that the initial enthusiasm has died down a little, the Premier has issued an appeal to the nation to settle down to work. Naturally, the most immediate interest attaches to the attitude which the new Government will take up towards the various agreements concluded with the British Government by preceding Ministries, and which the Zaghloulist Government has promised to have cancelled or amended. It appears that hopes, or fears, as the case may be, that Saad Pasha, flushed with victory, would immediately proceed to drastic action in this connection were unfounded. Hitherto the attitude of the Prime Minister and his colleagues has been most conciliatory and tactful. It seems that the action of the Acting High Commissioner in disregarding precedent and going to call upon the Premier, instead of, as hitherto, waiting for the latter's call and then returning it, has been much appreciated in Egyptian circles, and, to judge by the very cordial atmosphere which prevailed at each of the two meetings between Mr. Clark Kerr and Saad Pasha, the latter has no intention of doing anything to disturb the friendly relations which have been initiated. So far as can be judged from the statements of Zaghloul Pasha and the articles in his party's newspapers, the new Government considers that nothing much can be done towards paving the way for eventual negotiations between the British and Egyptian Government until after the meeting of the Egyptian Parliament. Between now and then it is probable that friendly and fairly close contact will be maintained between the Residency and the Ministry, for both sides realise that many potential difficulties may be avoided by informal conversations beforehand, but beyond this little can yet be done towards hastening the solution of the questions still outstanding between Egypt and Great Britain.

Two Difficult Questions.

On the other hand, the new Cabinet will experience, just as every previous Ministry has done, the need for some early and tangible success with which to present its supporters as the first fruits of the electoral victory and an earnest of more to come. To supply this want, the Government, it is understood, hopes to secure concessions in two directions. First, where political prisoners are concerned; and, secondly, in regard to the compensation of foreign officials leaving the Egyptian Government's service. Both problems are sufficiently thorny. It will be remembered that at the time of the promulgation of the Indemnity Act last summer some 250 political prisoners, about two-thirds of the whole number, were released. There still remain in confinement 145 of these men, and all of them, it is important to bear in mind, were sentenced, by British military courts, it is true, but all for offences against the common law, such as murder, attempted murder, conspiracy to murder, rioting, arson, and so on. The existing machinery for periodical revision of their sentences was set up by the Indemnity Act, and consists of an Anglo-Egyptian Commission, on which British representation predominates, and which from time to time reviews the convicts' sentences and advises the Egyptian Government regarding remission of such of the unexpired terms of imprisonment as it thinks fit. It is the wish of the new Government to have this Commission abolished, and the whole, or, at any rate, most, of the remaining prisoners released at once. Negotiations in this connection, if not already begun, will be started during the next few days.

Foreign Officials' Claims.

The second direction in which Zaghloul Pasha hopes for early tangible results is in connection with the Foreign Officials' Compensation Law, which he has frequently condemned, and which he intends to submit to Parliament at an early date.

In the meantime he is anxious to get the operation of the law suspended until Parliament meets.

The New Democracy.

In purely administrative matters Zaghloul Pasha's Government has made one or two innovations which have caused a little surprise, but no disapproval. First, as regards titles: pashas and beys in Egypt are nowadays extremely common. These ranks, especially the latter, are applied as indiscriminately as, in England, is that of esquire. It has become the custom to term every official earning more than twenty pounds a month a bey. Thus, two of the new Ministry, Morcos Hanna, Minister of Public Works, and Neguib Gherabli, Minister of Justice, have always been known as beys, although they have no real claim to the grade. But in the list of Ministers which Zaghloul Pasha handed to the King these two were properly described as effendis. Hitherto it has been the unvarying practice for any new Minister, if he were not already a pasha, to be immediately promoted to the rank. The same has applied to Under-Secretaries of State, and very often to heads of departments also. In Egypt, unlike Turkey, it has become an unwritten law that a pasha must not serve under a bey, nor a bey under an effendi. But, after a week in office, the Ministers of Justice and Public Works are still effendis, and Zaghloul Pasha revealed his views in the matter when, visiting the Ministry of Justice on Thursday morning, and hearing the officials cheer him and "Gherabli Pasha," he gently chided them for "seeming to slight the honourable title of effendi." In other ways, too, the new Ministry has displayed a hitherto unknown spirit of democracy. Ministers and senior officials are accessible to a greater degree, and the whole Government service seems to have received a much-needed stimulus.

Egypt's Water Needs.

One of the questions shelved by the last Ministry, to which it is hoped that the new Government will give early attention, is irrigation policy, which may be said at the moment to be non-existent. Mr. C. E. Dupuis' admirable report, presented to the Council of Ministers as long ago as last May, has never been published, and now lies, apparently forgotten, in dusty pigeon-holes. Until this document, which goes deeply into the whole question of this country's water requirements, present and future, and how they can be met, has been read and discussed, it will be impossible for the Government to frame any sort of irrigation policy. Even if this is not considered a matter of urgency, the subject of water is so deeply involved with the larger problem of Egypt's independence that it is hard to see how an Egyptian delegation can enter on negotiations with Great Britain without having previously made itself fully acquainted with the questions with which Mr. Dupuis' report deals. Meanwhile, the collection of further information which the report declared necessary goes on, the last step in this direction being the despatch of Dr. H. E. Hurst, head of the Physical Department, to the Upper Nile and Great Lakes, to study water supply, evaporation, and rainfall, and to correlate meteorological observations on the Lake Plateau with those in Egypt and the Sudan. Dr. Hurst is already exceedingly well known in connection with this kind of work; it is reported that, in conjunction with Mr. Watt, resident engineer at the Assouan Dam, he has produced a new device for water measurement, which is to be used on the present tour.

Scotswoman and Native Courts.

The Sirry case, mentioned in my letter of January 6, came to an end on Thursday, when the Cairo Native Court of First Instance sentenced Mrs. Sirry, the Scottish-born wife of an Egyptian tinsmith, to one day's imprisonment with hard labour for forging documents with the intent to secure her husband's acquittal on the charge of receiving stolen goods. This is probably the first time that a British-born woman has ever been sentenced by a Native Court, and the extreme lightness of her penalty may well have been due to the Court's realisation of her ignominious position, for her forgery was abundantly proved. She had gone to the length of having printed in Cairo duplicate billheads of Glasgow firms, from whom she declared her husband had bought the goods which were proved to have been stolen in Cairo.

YUGOSLAVIA.

Liubliana, January 31.

The Pact of Rome.

Just as everybody expected the Conference of the Little Entente in Belgrade to end in an extension of the Franco-Czechoslovak Treaty, we were surprised by reports of an Agreement between Italy and Yugoslavia. These reports were presently substantiated, and to-day we are confronted by the fact of a definite Treaty between Italy and Yugoslavia, signed on January 27, at the Palazzo Chigi in Rome.

This Treaty will be recorded in history as the Pact of Rome; and if only both parties to it are veritably animated by good will, it will, moreover, merit a place in history, because in that case it means that the Adriatic question is solved and the peace of Europe placed on a sound basis.

This Pact of Rome falls into two parts—the Pact proper, and the Fiuman Agreement. The first part constitutes a gain for Yugoslavia. Italy scores in the second. The essential stipulations of the Pact of Rome are as follows:—

(1) The high contracting parties pledge themselves to mutual support and sincere co-operation in upholding the provisions of the Treaties of Trianon, St. Germain, and Neuilly.

(2) Should one of the contracting parties be subjected to an unprovoked attack on the part of one or more Powers, the second party pledges itself to remain neutral for the whole duration of the conflict, and to afford political and diplomatic support to the party attacked.

(3) Both parties pledge themselves to it that whenever, on the occasion of international conflicts, the two parties realise that their interests are identical, they will undertake joint protective measures.

(4) This Convention holds good for five years, but notice of renewal or termination may be given one year before it expires.

(5) The Treaty comes into force immediately upon its ratification in Rome.

The Treaty bears the signatures of Signor Mussolini as Italian Premier and Minister for Foreign Affairs, and of M. Pashitch as Yugoslav Prime Minister, and of M. Nintchitch, as Yugoslavia's Minister for Foreign Affairs.

The essential part of the Treaty is embodied in clauses (1) and (2), which are obviously directed against Sofia and Budapest, the only centres to-day where anyone is at all likely to rebel against the Treaties of Trianon and Neuilly. The real value of the Pact, for Yugoslavia, lies in the circumstance that it safeguards her against a concentrated attack from all her neighbours at once. It is this aspect of the Pact, moreover, which is persuading Yugoslav public opinion to a more conciliatory mood towards the Treaty, although by the Fiuman Agreement the Treaty of Rapallo has been thrown over to the disadvantage of Yugoslavia.

The Fiuman Agreement.

By this new Agreement, Yugoslavia recognises the annexation of Fiume by Italy, and receives no compensation, properly speaking, in return, since the port of Barosh and the Delta had already been assigned to her by the Treaty of Rapallo. Her compensation for Italy's annexation of Fiume is, in fact, the pledge of Italy's neutrality in case of attack by a neighbouring State. Yugoslav public opinion is sensible of this point, and on its account can understand the Treaty.

All the same, the Pact of Rome has its drawbacks, which cause the Croats and Slovenes especially to be distinctly opposed to its final acceptance. First of all, there are the complaints of the Yugoslav population in the littoral against Fascist tyranny and oppression. It is only natural that they do not find it easy to believe in the sincerity of a Government which, on the one hand, solemnly protests its friendly disposition towards Yugoslavia, and on the other forbids Yugoslav children of six to receive school instruction in their mother tongue. One hopes that Mussolini's undoubted statesmanship will triumph over the petty outlook of the Triestine Fascists, and that the Yugoslavs of the littoral, whose attitude throughout is that of loyal Italian citizens, may not be goaded into irredentism by gratuitous exasperation. Herein lies the acid test for the duration and value of the Pact of Rome.

The Internal Position.

The efforts of the Democratic Party, especially its leader, M. Davidovitch, to rally all the Opposition parties in one Opposition Bloc, has definitely failed, as was really a foregone conclusion.

The only raison d'être for an Opposition Bloc would be that it was strong enough to overturn the Government. But this cannot be done unless M. Raditch goes to Belgrade—and indeed the Democrat Press is very anxious to persuade us of the probability of such a move—either in person or by proxy, as it were, by allowing a number of his deputies to go. Yet it is very improbable that M. Raditch, who feels himself at the zenith of his power, should appear in Belgrade and there take the oath of allegiance to the King and Constitution as a preliminary to exercising his functions as a deputy. He can scarcely afford to take the oath of allegiance. His demagogic agitation has been too violent, his speeches have been too extreme, for his electors to understand if he were now to swear allegiance to the King, let alone to uphold the Constitution.

So M. Raditch himself is hardly likely to go to Belgrade, whatever course his followers adopt.

Still, M. Davidovitch's followers, and also the Spaho and Koroshets groups, would dearly like to see an Opposition Bloc; but, unfortunately, only for one-sided party considerations, and in order to play off one ally against another. Meanwhile, each party is itself far too well aware of the game, and therefore the Agrarian Party, for one, refuses to have anything to say to an Opposition Bloc.

The Visit to Amman.

For many weeks past the imminent visit of Hussein, King of the Hejaz, to Amman, in Transjordania, has provided almost the sole topic of interest. It is not the nature of this part of the East to take anything at its face value. Therefore, not for one moment has it ever been supposed that King Hussein's tour to the north was only a natural wish to survey the family domains. The visit was to settle once and for all the vexed question of what was to be Palestine's fate in the Anglo-Arab Treaty, it was to advertise the claims of the King of the Hejaz to the Khalifate, and it was to inaugurate the Pan-Arab Confederation. Hussein has now been nearly a week in Amman; deputations from all quarters and from all parties have been received in audience and allowed to kiss the Hashimite Majesty's hand. Greek Orthodox and Latin Patriarchs, and Jewish anti-Zionists and representatives of the Palestine Arab Executive, and the Palestine National Arab Party, and the newly formed Palestine Arab Peasant Party, and the High Commissioner, Sir Herbert Samuel, the Chief Secretary, Sir Gilbert Clayton, the District Governor of Jerusalem, Sir Ronald Storrs—all have been to Amman, and, it is to be supposed, have all in their own way, helped to clear King Hussein's mind about Palestine. After all the resulting claims and explanations we can almost understand the answer which the King of the Hejaz is said to have given—that if they could only come along to him in a single deputation to inform him of the united wishes of all leaders and parties, then he would pay their expenses!

From the side of the local administration have come very emphatic statements that the visit of the High Commissioner to King Hussein was to be nothing but a formal paying of respects from the Palestine Government, that no really vital matters would be decided upon, and that no discussion would take place on the question of King Hussein's claims or supposed claims to the Khalifate. These assurances have not compelled much conviction, although it is obvious that in such "Palestinian Foreign Affairs" the High Commissioner could, at the very most, be no more than a channel for instructions from, and information to, the Colonial Office; and King Hussein has himself openly repudiated the allegations that he was personally aiming at the Khalifate. Government House is publishing but the baldest official communiqué in connection with this visit, but it is understood that the High Commissioner will again call on King Hussein before the latter leaves Transjordania in two or three weeks' time.

The Labour Party and Palestine.

No fears or expectations have so far been aroused of any change in policy as regards Palestine as a consequence of the rise to power of the Labour Party. Certain of the Labour leaders are known to be definitely sympathetic towards the Zionist experiment. At the worst Labour policy may spell further economies in foreign affairs; but the reductions anticipated in the next local Budget are already so extensive as to arouse real fears of inefficiency. Short of abandoning the country to the hands of the Palestinians themselves little more economy is possible.

The "Kadoorie Bequest."

Jewish circles have been feeling and expressing acute dissatisfaction over the "Kadoorie Bequest." Sir. Ellis Kadoorie, a wealthy Jewish merchant from somewhere in the further East, left a considerable legacy, something like £100,000, to the British Government, to be used for educational purposes in Mesopotamia and Palestine. Very few people here seemed to know the details or conditions of the bequest. Some four weeks ago it became known that the Palestine Administration proposed to make use of the Kadoorie thousands in building a large English college, of secondary education standard; the principal was to be English, the language of instruction English, the management of the school to be along English Public School lines, and the school to be open to all Palestinians, irrespective of race and religion. Jewish opinion then forced itself to the front with its own version of the facts. According to this version, Kadoorie was a simple-minded Baghdad Jew, who had heard vaguely about the Balfour Declaration and the setting up of a Jewish State in Palestine. Wishing to do his little bit towards establishing better conditions in this Jewish national home, he left his wealth to the Palestine Government for use in furthering education. He, in his innocence, thought that by leaving the money to the Palestine Government he was leaving it to the organised body of Palestinian Jewry, that it would go exclusively towards building up Hebrew education in his ancestral country; he never realised that the Palestine Government was far from being Jewish, and was, in fact, a purely English Administration whose single policy was to confine the spiritual hopes of Palestinian Jewry to the most reduced limits. What this innocent Baghdad Jew had, in spite of his good intentions, succeeded in doing, was to forge a weapon which should prove the worst possible enemy against Hebrew education in Palestine: his money was to be used for a purely English school, where Hebrew talk would take a very second place; this English school would attract, by its cheapness and up-to-dateness and its Englishness, the most promising of Jewish youth away from the Hebrew schools, and they would no longer have installed into them Hebrew thought, Hebrew history, and Hebrew patriotism. The simple Baghdad Jew had succeeded in totally wrecking what he aimed at building up: he had meant to leave his wealth to the Jews, but it had all fallen into other hands by which it must be used, however unwittingly, in a fashion adverse to Jewish nationalist interests.

Then, at last, an official communication was published to the effect that the money was left not to Palestine, but "to the British Government, to be spent by it on the provision of schools in Palestine or Mesopotamia. Although several of the other bequests of the will were for institutions for the benefit of Jews, no such provision was made with respect to this particular gift. The British Government have accepted the bequest, and have decided that the funds, which are likely to amount to a sum in the neighbourhood of £100,000, are to be spent in Palestine. In view of the terms of the will, it has not felt itself justified in limiting the expenditure to schools for the Jewish population. A scheme for the expenditure of the money, to the best advantage of all sections of the population, is now under the consideration of the British Government, in conjunction with the High Commissioner for Palestine."

PERSIA.

Teheran, January 15.

Arrears of Taxes.

The American advisers are meeting with considerable success in collecting past due arrears of revenues and taxes, and many wealthy landowners and tribal chiefs who have for years past evaded payment are being made to disgorge at least part of the amounts due by them. Backed by a Central Government strong enough to make its influence felt and to enforce payment, the financial agents in the provinces are finding it much easier than heretofore to deal with recalcitrant debtors, and the Treasury coffers are beginning to be filled from hitherto inaccessible and unwonted sources. Colonel MacCormack, in charge of the Indirect Taxation Department of the Ministry of Finance, has returned from his trip to the South, in the course of which he recovered tomans 100,000 in cash from the Sheikh of Mohammerah, on accounts of arrears of taxes, and an undertaking to pay the remaining tomans 400,000 by instalments. Ghavam ul Mulk, a wealthy landowner of Fars, has also undertaken to pay the amount of tomans 148,000 due by him, and Sardar Mohtashem, one of the Bakhtiari Chiefs, has likewise acknowledged his indebtedness to the Treasury, for part of which he has given property and engages to pay the rest gradually. The Khan of Makou, on the north-western frontier of Azerbaijan, near Mount Ararat, who has for many years refused to recognise the Central Government and defied all their efforts to extract revenues and taxes due by him, has at last, by the aid of the Military, been brought to book and acknowledged a sum of some million tomans due, part of which he has paid in cash, with an undertaking to settle the remainder in instalments.

These important recoveries are highly gratifying, and inspire the belief that, given continued success in this direction and a strong hand at the helm of the affairs of State, Persia will at no far distant date be in a position to balance her Budget without recourse to foreign commitments, which in the past have always been, and still continue to be, like a mill-stone round her neck.

Aeroplanes for the Army.

The papers announced a few days ago that the Government has purchased in France twelve aeroplanes, through the Chief of the Staff, General Prince Amanullah Mirza, the head of the party of Military student officers sent to Europe at the beginning of last year to undergo a course of training and study military matters. These planes have been shipped to Persia in charge of a few French mechanics, who will remain only long enough to train Persian pilots in the use of the machines.

The initiation of this modern development of warfare, quite new to the Persian Army, and the order for several armoured cars which the Government has placed in Europe, is evidence of the War Minister's desire to march with the times and develop the army on modern lines into an efficient fighting force. The Persian plateau provides not bad country for flying, and the chief difficulty would appear to be in establishing an adequate system of aerodromes and petrol dumps throughout the country, in view of the lack of suitable communication between the various centres. The moral effect of an aeroplane raid among rebellious tribesmen, quite unused to these death-dealing machines, would be undoubtedly great, and a few judiciously dropped bombs would probably have more effect on them than a battalion of infantry! An instance of this demoralising effect of an unknown weapon of warfare occurred in 1911 during the ex-Shah's advance on Teheran in his futile attempt to regain the throne. A force of some thousands of wild Turkoman tribesmen under Arshad ed Dowleh were within 40 miles of the capital; a scratch force was hastily equipped and despatched to meet them, and a Maxim gun, under a German Colonel attached to the Persian Army, decided the issue. The tribesmen far outnumbered their opponents, but the bark of the Maxim, which they had never heard before, completely unnerved them when it opened fire, and caused them to turn tail and flee; and the rising collapsed.

Persian Communications.

The Minister of Public Works, accompanied by Mr. Mitchell, the American adviser attached to that Ministry, last week left for Fars on a tour of inspection of the roads in the South, and it is supposed that this is in connection with the recent purchase by the Government of 20 German motor-lorries, said to be for the postal service, from Bushire, on the Persian Gulf, to the North. At present the only route by which parcels by post are accepted in Europe for Persia is "Poste Restante Bushire," and as transport from that port is very limited, considerable delay occurs in the forwarding of these parcels to their destination, and it is to be hoped that the contemplated motor service will greatly improve this unsatisfactory state of affairs. As regards letters and other postal matter, there are now no less than four different routes open to and from Persia, and the lately reopened route via Russia appears to be working smoothly, the average time of transit being only some 19 days, in comparison with about 25 days by Air Mail via Baghdad and Cairo or the newly organised overland route via Baghdad-Haifa, with the added advantage of being considerably cheaper than these last two. The old sea route via Mesopotamia and India is now seldom used, taking as it does nearly six weeks. Letters by the Russian route have hitherto been sent through only as far as Moscow and forwarded on from there, which gave reason for fearing their going astray, but now the Post Office here advise us that sealed bags are made up for the principal countries in Europe and beyond, so this should ensure a safe and quick mode of transit, bringing Persia into speedier communication with the outer world than for some years past.

Laws for Foreigners.

The Cabinet Council has just revised and amplified the passport and immigration laws, and if this measure is ratified by the next Mejliss foreigners will be subject to such regulations as prevail in most European countries with regard to registration. According to the new laws no foreigner will be allowed to enter the country unless he has on him, or can prove he is worth, at least 100 tomans (£20); hotel and lodging-house proprietors must notify to the police the names of all foreigners staying with them, not later than 24 hours after their arrival, and all foreigners will have to be registered and carry the relative certificate with them, to be produced on demand by the police at any time. Seyed Zia ed Din attempted to introduce a similar measure after the coup d'état of February, 1921, but it was not carried out before his sudden fall from power, and was ultimately dropped. The present law seems directed mainly against the crowds of needy and destitute Russian and other refugees who have of recent years flocked into the country in the hopes of eking out a precarious livelihood by hook or crook.

Shops and the Sabbath.

Another measure on which Seyed Zia ed Din insisted during his brief Premiership, and which has since been disregarded, is the compulsory closing of shops on Friday, the Moslem Sabbath, and other religious holidays, and this is now to be revived by the new Premier, Sardar Sepah, who has issued a notice to all shopkeepers that this practice must in future be observed.

Retirement of General Westdahl.

His contract having expired and not being renewed by the Government, General Westdahl, the Swedish Chief of the Police, has been relieved of his position, which he has filled with conspicuous success, in spite of the innumerable difficulties which he has encountered since he undertook to reorganise this service eleven years ago. His place has been filled by a certain Colonel Mohamed Khan, of the Persian Army.

With the retirement of General Westdahl, public life and official circles in Teheran will lose an imposing and conspicuous figure, and the foreign community a popular member of society whose never-failing geniality has made him a favourite with all. With him, also, passes the last sign of the Swedish influence in the country, which commenced with the engagement of Swedish officers under Colonel Hjalmarson in 1910 to establish the Gendarmerie, and of police officials from Sweden to reorganise the ragged band of "catch-em-alivo's" who went by the name of police, and who have since been formed into an efficient force known as the Nazmieh. The Gendarmerie, for the first few years after its formation, admittedly did sterling work in subduing brigandage and highway robbery, and the Swedish officers deserve every credit for the well-equipped and well-disciplined force which they created out of the unpromising material at their disposal, but the poisonous efforts of the German agents provocateurs in Persia in the early days of the War, in which their sympathies were naturally all on the side of the Central Powers, in view of their inveterate hatred of Russia and all things Russian, undermined the Swedes' loyalty towards their Persian employers, and with very few exceptions they threw in their lot with the German adventurers, and, of course, the troops under their command followed them. With this force behind them the Germans and Turks were enabled to do tremendous damage to Russian and especially to British interests in Persia, providing the sinews of war by looting whenever possible the branches of the Imperial Bank of Persia and helping themselves to their notes and cash. General Westdahl was one of the exceptions. He remained strictly neutral throughout, and, in fact, when a plot was on foot to murder him, it was the action of the British Legation (who had got wind of the plot, of which, curiously enough, Westdahl himself was quite unaware) which saved his life, by asking him to spend the night in their compound. When the young Shah was on the point of yielding to intriguers in the pay of the Germans during those critical days in November, 1915 (when Russian troops were but 20 miles from Teheran) and was all ready to leave for Ispahan, Westdahl (in whom the Shah has always had great confidence) threw in his weight on the side of the British and Russian Ministers, and induced His Majesty to abandon his departure, thus saving the situation and checkmating the Germans' designs to create chaos, which would inevitably have followed the Court's departure from the capital.

For his services to British interests in Persia during the War General Westdahl was awarded a C.B.E., a decoration of which he is justly proud.

A University at Teheran.

The Ministry of Public Instruction is taking steps for the foundation of a University of Teheran, and has already acquired a large building in the park belonging to the late Zil es Sultan for this purpose.

EGYPT AND BRITAIN.

There is a homely resemblance between the situation in Egypt and that in Great Britain as a result of the recent changes of Government in the two countries. Unfavourable prognostications had been the order of the day in each case; but within a very short time in Egypt, as in this country, the attitude of the pessimists has undergone a marked change. No encouragement at all has been given to the worst fears entertained; on the other hand, even an inveterate opponent of political experiments is forced to admit the existence of some quite satisfactory features. It will not detract from the good impression that Zaghloul Pasha has already made if there is a tendency in England to congratulate ourselves that there was just sufficient time between Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's accession to power and his own to allow the Egyptian Prime Minister to follow his British colleague's cue. His acceptance of office, in fact, which at one time was by no means a foregone conclusion, is generally supposed to have been decided upon as a result of the changes in Great Britain. There are no indications of extremism in the Egyptian Ministry, and Zaghloul Pasha has quickly appreciated the value of the lesson set by the new British Government that there is nothing incompatible between democracy and hastening slowly. Combined with steady work as the keynote of his administration, he has insisted upon investigation and consideration as essential preliminaries to any formal Government programme. There can be no better augury for the establishment of good relations between Britons and Egyptians. Whatever misgivings the former may at one time have had in regard to the proposed changes in Egypt, the new order has been unreservedly accepted. The British people have no fear of any reasoned challenge of their acts or position in the land; they deprecated only hasty reversals of policy for the mere sake of breaking with the past. Egypt is the last country in the world that should indulge in political leaps in the dark. There was at one time ground for supposing that the Egyptians would be tempted to celebrate their independence by something in the nature of the freak and ill-digested methods of the Grand National Assembly of Turkey. If such tendencies exist among his followers, Zaghloul Pasha has taken early steps to discourage them.

We welcome the practical illustration of Britain's good will towards the new order in Egypt that the British Government has given by assenting to an amnesty for prisoners sentenced by Military Courts, with certain agreed exceptions. There can be no question as to the wisdom or legality of the punishment meted out to those who are now to be pardoned. Their motives may have been political, but they showed that they belonged to a type which has difficulty in appreciating the boundary line between constitutional and criminal methods of achieving political aims. Released, as they will be, to find a new order established in Egypt, they should be under no temptation to repeat their law-breaking. It would be unfortunate, however, if the lesson of their offences were forgotten. These men, while posing as patriots, lacked the balance necessary for good citizens, and were as embarrassing to their own people as they were to the British. It is just conceivable that, if they chose to study some of Zaghloul Pasha's own utterances since he returned to Egypt, they would find enough encouragement to believe that Egypt is still as far off independence as ever. That this is not the case the new Prime Minister knows quite well. It is desirable, therefore, that those in authority should consider their words as carefully as their programmes, and give no cause for rash acts on the part of the less balanced section of the population, who may feel that in resorting to the worst excesses they are carrying out the behests of their superiors, or at least helping their cause. Since taking office Zaghloul Pasha has undoubtedly set a salutary example. He has declared that the first preoccupation of the Ministry is to replace discord by amity, and he has not hesitated to practise what he preaches. The sight of the Prime Minister and the Acting High Commissioner driving together from Gizeh to Cairo in a dilapidated car, the only one available, in order that the former might acquaint the King without delay of Great Britain's assent to the amnesty is more likely to impress the new policy on his less enlightened followers than many speeches.

It will profit neither Egypt nor Great Britain to suppose that all will be plain sailing in future for the relations between the two countries. The chief crux is likely to be the question of the Sudan, in regard to which both parties have strong opinions. If it is not possible to postpone the consideration of this problem for several years, it is to be hoped that only those points on which agreement can be more or less readily reached will come up for discussion and the remainder be relegated to later negotiations. There is a tendency in Egypt to regard the question of the Sudan as a matter of life or death. In some respects it is. The Nile water must be so subjected to regulation—as indeed it is at present—that there must never be the least danger of prejudice being done arbitrarily to Egyptian needs. On this point, however, the interests of Egypt and Great Britain are identical, for, whereas Egypt grows the cotton, it may be said to be grown almost exclusively for British requirements, and the interests of the growers cannot be harmed without prejudice to the interests of the Lancashire cotton industry. If any misgivings on the score of possible rivalry have been aroused in Egypt by the future held out for the cotton production in the Sudan, they must be met by full and patient discussion. It will certainly not improve the Egyptian case if the idea gained currency that Egypt's aspirations in the Sudan contemplated interference with the expansion of cotton areas. On the British side it is an axiom that no prejudice to Egyptian cotton growing is possible from the Sudan, for it is matter of common knowledge that all the water that Egypt can ever require can be obtained without affecting the Sudan's supply. In all probability these technical matters are beyond the understanding of the man in the street, and for this reason it is essential that popular passions should not be roused by rash statements based on ignorance of the real facts. The future of the Sudan is a question for statesmen and experts, and Zaghloul Pasha could not give evidence of his statesmanship in any better way than by resolutely setting his face against premature platform oratory on the subject. The technical points can be discussed without delay; the political question, which is not a matter of life and death for Egypt, can with advantage be postponed until independent Egypt and Britain-out-of-Egypt have a better knowledge of one another.

BRITISH SUBJECTS AND TURKISH REPARATIONS.

By the Treaty of Lausanne it was agreed that the sum of £4,500,000 should be devoted to the reparation of damage suffered by Allied nationals in Turkey. A subsequent Convention between Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan, signed in Paris on November 23, 1923, settled the procedure in connection with the assessment and reparation of the damage, and at the same time embodied the consent of the British Government to add to the sum as fixed by Article 58 of the Treaty of Lausanne certain Five per Cent. Turkish Government Treasury Bills, 1911, of the nominal value of £846,100, which the British Treasury purchased from the holders in 1914. The reason actuating the British Government in contributing this latter sum to the Allied "pool" does not appear to have been specified. When once the decision had been taken to treat on a common footing the whole question of reparation for damage suffered by individuals, it might be difficult to justify supplementary payment to British subjects in regard to losses incurred by them simultaneously with other Allied subjects. On the other hand, if it could be shown that British subjects had suffered special damage which was not shared by others, there would seem to have been a strong case for the British Government to use any funds of Turkish origin of which it was possessed for making good its nationals' losses.

In the opinion of British residents in Turkey this particular set of conditions does exist. In the days immediately preceding the outbreak of the Great War, Great Britain, although not standing officially as high as Germany in the good books of Turkey, nevertheless occupied a notable position in the Turkish scheme of affairs. The Turkish navy was being organised by a British Naval Commission; British capitalists were interested in various development schemes, such as graving docks and shipbuilding works for Constantinople, harbours for Samsoun and other ports, and irrigation works on the Euphrates; orders for the construction of two super-Dreadnoughts, together with other men-of-war, had been placed with two British firms. In connection with the two battleships a first payment on account had been raised by public subscription in Turkey, and a sum of about £5,000,000 had been paid. Just as one of the Turkish ships, however, was on the point of being ready to be handed over and the second was nearing completion, the menace of war with Germany became acute, and the British Government found itself obliged to requisition the warships building for Turkey, as well as one for Chile. The fact that the ships were being paid for in large measure by public subscription invested them with a special sanctity in the eyes of the Turkish public, quite apart from any political schemes that the Government may have had in view, and their confiscation by Britain evoked a violent storm of protest in Turkey. With the whole-hearted support of the people, the Constantinople Government embarked upon a campaign of deliberate reprisal by requisitioning British property. Only three months later did Turkey enter the War against the Allies.

It was during the period from August 1 to November 1, 1914, that, in the opinion of British residents in Constantinople, special damage was done to them, from which the nationals of other Allied countries were exempt, as the direct result of the confiscation of the Turkish battleships. For this reason they hold that their claims in connection with this period should be differentiated from claims in regard to subsequent damage common to all the Allies. Requisition bonds were given by the Turks for property seized during these three months, when Turkey was a neutral country, and these, it is understood, constitute the basis of the British claims. By Article 58 of the Treaty of Lausanne it was agreed that Great Britain should abandon claims on the part of British subjects for requisitions, seizure of property, etc., and that Turkey should waive her claim to the £5,000,000 deposited in this country in part payment of the battleships which had been confiscated by the British Government. The case of the British residents in Constantinople is that, in view of the fact that the damage suffered by them, which was represented by the requisition bonds, was the direct outcome of the seizure of the Turkish ships, the £5,000,000 of Turkish money derived by the British Treasury, as it were, from those ships, should be used to indemnify British residents for their losses. There is admittedly no claim against Turkey as a result of the agreement reached at Lausanne; but it is contended that these first category claims, as they are called, are distinct from those of the subsequent period which have to be pooled with the claims of other Allied nationals, and that the £5,000,000 seized by the British Treasury should, in equity, be used to defray the compensation due on these claims.

In the absence of any rebutting evidence, it would seem as if the contention of British residents in Constantinople regarding these "first category" claims is well founded in equity, even if they can have no redress at law. Certainly the question is one that should be squarely faced by the British Government. The principle of reparations has been admitted; but the £25,000,000 earmarked for the purpose by the Treaty of Sèvres became £4,500,000 in the Treaty of Lausanne, and, presumably, when payment comes to be made the individual will receive only a relatively small proportion of his original claim. The outbreak of the War occasioned losses, with almost as direct an incidence as Turkish requisitions, to many British subjects, who have had no chance of recouping themselves from any source, and who will not have given a thought to such an eventuality. It will, therefore, be a temptation to some people to argue that there is no special reason why one set of British subjects should be treated differently from another, and that the claims for reparations from Turkey should be placed in a single category and met from whatever sum was provided for the purpose in the Treaty of Lausanne. The Treasury, we may be certain, will be very unwilling to be asked in 1924 to produce extra millions on the strength of a windfall of nine or ten years ago that went at once into the bottomless sieve of War costs. In any case, this particular claim of British residents in Constantinople should be dealt with finally in one way or another. They have been allowed to entertain hopes of obtaining special compensation, and the delay in the settlement of their claims has become a grievance. A clear statement from the Government which can be shown to be endorsed by the House of Commons will enable those who have been inclined to devote all their time to this question of reparations to know how they stand.

ISLAM AND THE WEST.

The following is the text of the reply to the Address of Welcome of the British Muslim Society by Aziz Izzet Pasha, Minister of Egypt, at the Shah Jehan Mosque, Woking, on February 3:—

"Pray accept my most cordial thanks for the warm welcome you have given me to-day at the Shah Jehan Mosque. The reputation of this Western vanguard of Islam is very great among our brethren throughout the East, where Mussulmans keep watch over the highest spiritual interests of our Faith.

"We are all of us aware that Khwaja Kamal-ud-Din, the distinguished founder of this Mosque, whose absence to-day we so much regret, is one of those enlightened thinkers of Islam who has long perceived that the Moslem world must begin to take cognisance of the position and feelings of the West if she is to be given a place worthy of her greatness. He laid the foundations of this Eastern stronghold at a time when prejudice was doing its utmost to destroy the last vestiges of Oriental greatness. He succeeded in inspiring confidence in the hearts of those impartial and high-minded Europeans who knew how much human civilisation owes to Islam.

"Thanks to their sympathetic interest and support in advancing the spiritual and intellectual development of the East, this Mosque has succeeded in creating an atmosphere of good will and confidence. And now that important friendships have been formed in this country where religious and political toleration has always been traditional, and now that our aspirations towards a reconstruction of the East are more thoroughly grasped, we may well claim that Mussulmans themselves will do all in their power to come to a better understanding with the Western world, of whose science, technical equipment, and knowledge they are so much in need, without on that account sacrificing their spiritual heritage.

"It is the object of our desire to win complete equality with Western nations, but if we are to master their science we must work hard indeed. But while we are well aware that the West must, for many years to come, be our teacher in the sphere of the technical sciences, we claim that we, too, have something to teach the West in the domain of spiritual culture; and we believe that the history of Islamic civilisations deserves more study in Western Universities than it receives at present.

"The history of Eastern civilisations is the most neglected branch of modern historical research, and it is for this reason that the intellectual leaders of the Anglo-Saxon world have not always understood the Eastern problems. It is our duty to see to it that in the future Islam should be the object of more careful study, among Western peoples. For science and history are the great moral powers that ultimately mould all human thought.

"Islam is indeed one of the greatest moral and spiritual forces of the world, and if this force is placed at the services of humanity nothing but the highest good can follow. The greatness of Islam as a human confraternity consists precisely in the splendid and glorious part our religion and our social ideals have played in creating the moral unity of Western Asia and North Africa. And we shall only be fulfilling the highest traditions of Islam if we bring every force to bear that can contribute towards achieving the moral unity of all the nations on earth without regard for distinctions of race or creeds. From this standpoint we Mussulmans are the teachers of a world all too sadly divided, the racial quarrels of which have never been accepted by Islam as a principle of rulership. We have been the heralds of racial equality ever since the earliest days of Islam, and I venture to say that our Holy Prophet did more for the moral unity of a large part of mankind than any other historical figure since his days.

"I am sure His Majesty the King, my august Sovereign, who is so enlightened and cultured, and who has done so much for Egypt's intellectual and moral advancement, will be very much pleased and interested to hear of the spiritual and moral progress of your work in this country.

"May Almighty Allah help us all, Muslims as well as our brethren of other creeds, towards the establishment of that human confraternity which constitutes the deepest trend of human history. I thank Him, the Most Merciful and Omnipresent, and I thank you all as well for the great honour you have done me in according me this hearty welcome at the Shah Jehan Mosque."

We append herewith the Address of Welcome, which was read by Lord Headley, to Aziz Izzet Pasha:—

We, the members of the British Muslim Society, desire to offer to Your Excellency, our Brother in the Faith, a most cordial and fraternal welcome on the occasion of this, Your Excellency's first official visit to England as the accredited representative of H.M. the King of Egypt.

We are confident that the dawning of a new era in the age-long history of Egypt is the herald of a future of national glory, honour, and prosperity in full accord with the unique and glorious traditions of that ancient land; that the new and intricate problems which are arising, and must inevitably arise in the near future, will find right and worthy solution under the gracious guidance of His Majesty. More particularly do we desire Your Excellency to convey to His Majesty King Fuad our most heartfelt thanks for the truly Royal welcome extended by His Majesty to our brothers, the Khwaja Kamal-ud-Din, Lord Headley and Mufti Abdul Mohyi, on the occasion of their recent pilgrimage to Mecca, a welcome whereof the memory will not lightly be effaced from the hearts of British Muslims.

We of the British Muslim Society, most of whom owe our conversion to the Faith of Divine Reason—which is Islam—to the tireless and unselfish labours of the Woking Muslim Mission in England and its devoted leader, the Khwaja Kamal-ud-Din, while too keenly conscious of the bitter and relentless prejudice still put forth by the Christian Church (in all its denominations) against Islam, can in all sincerity affirm of our own experience that from Islam towards Christianity, or any other religion of the One True God, there proceeds nothing but toleration, sympathy, and active good will.

We feel that the root of this trouble, as of most evil, lies in misunderstanding, and in extending our cordial good wishes to Egypt on resuming her rightful place in the comity of free nations we are confident that a momentous step has been taken towards the re-establishment of Islam in the councils of the world; and that with a wider knowledge and clearer comprehension, alike of the principles and practice of our Faith, the clouds of prejudice and misunderstanding will presently disperse, and Christian and Muslim find common ground at last in the service of Allah.

We pray that the blessing of Allah may be with Your Excellency and with the great and ancient country of which you are the representative.

OIL AND THE POWERS.

"THE WORLD-STRUGGLE FOR OIL." By Pierre l'Espagnol de la Tramerye. Translated from the French by C. Leonard Leese. (London: Allen and Unwin. 8s. 6d.)

There is little doubt that the significance of oil in the modern world is now well understood, but people generally are not sufficiently informed on the details of the concerns which possess the monopoly of the commodity that influences and sometimes directs the policies of the Great Powers. It was just after the War that the ordinary man came to perceive how powerful the oil companies were becoming and the danger of their respective jealousies. Not long after the Armistice an American prospector for oil was arrested by the British authorities on the shores of the Dead Sea! But this world-struggle for the sources of oil was subsequently obscured from the public view for a time; it flared up again, however, at the Genoa Conference, which reeked of the precious liquid: and more recently, with the pother caused by the proposal of the British Government to sell its shares in the Anglo-Persian, then fighting in Mexico, and the oil scandal in America, it may well be termed the most prominent object in the interest of the world to-day.

It is good, therefore, to have a translation of this book, which in France, where, of course, they are better informed, reached last year its third edition. M. de la Tramerye's study is competent, comprehensive, and for the most part dispassionate. The author traces the pre-War rivalry between Britain, Germany, and the United States and tells how that struggle has since developed between England and America alone, with France almost a mere onlooker. He shows how the various Governments have been behind their companies, whether the Standard or the Anglo-Persian; and he demonstrates how the Royal Dutch-Shell combine was bound to benefit whichever side won the War.

It is a most fascinating and instructive story that M. de la Tramerye tells. He himself, though feeling deeply the present plight of France owing to her inertia in the matter, cannot withhold admiration from the successful ones in the struggle. Of Lord Fisher's work in introducing, in the face of opposition, oil into the British Navy he speaks in terms of highest praise. But he does not obtrude any moral—that indeed is obvious enough, for if things were to develop between Britain and America as they developed in the years immediately after the War, nothing could stop another war. At the moment the Americans are more successful than they have for some time been, for they have secured the concession in N. Persia, and are reported to have struck oil in Palestine, whereas no similar success on the part of British companies has been recorded for some time. The most important part of the world for the next year or two will probably be Russia, a monopoly in which the Royal Dutch-Shell so nearly secured in 1922. With the recognition of the Soviet by the British Government we may expect a fierce battle to get the oilfields.

It is often said that Britain has frittered away the opportunities she had after the War in the Near East, but with what degree of truth may be judged by this remark of M. de la Tramerye concerning his own country:—

> The policy of France in the Near East since the war has been simply one long suicide. Little by little, French diplomacy has abandoned everything that was promised by the agreement of London. While the San Remo Agreement marked the complete downfall of France in Asia, it considerably strengthened the position of Britain; not only does it recognise all rights acquired by Great Britain, including those which, as in Mesopotamia, rested upon a highly insecure foundation, but it gives British capitalists an important opening in French colonies which are still almost untouched, whereas the corresponding advantages which it confers upon France in some (not all) British colonies apply to territories where the most desirable fields are already being exploited.

The matter is, of course, of vital importance to France, because military supremacy without the possession of oil means nothing. Tanks, aeroplanes, and submarines are useless to a nation that cannot command sufficient supplies of oil for operating them. No one knows at the moment whether France will throw in her lot with the Americans, as represented by the Standard, or with the Anglo-Persian and the Royal Dutch-Shell Subsidiary companies of these great combines now reach large numbers; in fact, they spread over the whole world. There is no lack of opportunity for France to take her choice! The problem is difficult enough for the United States, which, although it produces most oil, also consumes most; but it is even more difficult for France, who threatens to be at the mercy equally of the competing or the conciliatory policies of Britain and America.

This book is of essential importance to all students of modern European politics, but it is of especial importance to students of Near and Middle Eastern politics. Practically wherever one looks in these regions—in Egypt, Abyssinia, Algeria, Roumania, Palestine, Irak, the Caucasus, Persia, and so on—one finds the existing problems complicated by the presence in these countries of oil. Without such a thread as is provided in this book a comprehension of them would be almost impossible. "The World-Struggle for Oil" is, in short, a most timely publication.

BOMBS AND CIVILIANS.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—We wish to express our satisfaction at the official announcement that "the whole question of the employment of aircraft in Irak in support of the civil authorities is being considered by His Majesty's Government." We venture, further, to hope that never again will the Royal Air Force be employed in similar operations against natives, either in Irak or elsewhere.

Our reason for writing this letter is that we have all, as war correspondents or workers with the British Red Crescent Hospitals, been eye-witnesses of what such aerial bombing meant in the deserts of Tripoli during the Turco-Italian War of 1911-12. The Italians used their aeroplanes solely for scouting purposes, but on several occasions dropped bombs on desert villages from small airships. We realised from our own personal experiences that it was practically impossible to bomb such villages without maiming or killing a large proportion of women and children. It is these innocent victims and the old and infirm, who are unable to leave the villages, that suffer far more than the adult fighting men, who can often disperse and take shelter at a distance.—We are, etc.,

THE GORDON MEMORIAL COLLEGE.

In the "Report and Accounts" for 1922 of the Gordon Memorial College at Khartoum, the Principal of the College, Mr. John W. Crowfoot, states that far-reaching, though not essential, changes are contemplated owing to the development of the Sudan foreshadowed by the Sennar Dam and the Kassala Railway. But before these can be effected, there are immediate economies to be made. Although on the research side there can be no retrenchment, fewer engineers and kadis will be trained. Simple primary education will not permanently suffice for the advancing economic conditions, and more and more boys must be drafted into the Upper School of the College.

During this year will be seen the realisation at Khartoum of a Medical School, the students of which are to be selected from the final year students of the Gordon Memorial College, and which will be supervised by the College.

The "Report" contains an account of the various activities in research work, in geology, archæology, and natural history. It is obvious that the College is increasingly well prepared for the new responsibilities which the Government will certainly and in a short time impose upon it.

Conditions at Constantinople.

In his letter this week our Constantinople Correspondent deals with developments with regard to conditions at the port of Constantinople. The position at the port has gone from bad to worse under the new Turkish régime, and what with inadequate facilities and heavy dues it is not surprising that traders should be in despair. Our Correspondent refers to various proposals that have been made for the alteration of the existing state of affairs, and it remains to be seen whether the Turkish authorities can be brought to realise the need for action. The root of the trouble lies in the estrangement between Angora and Constantinople. It would seem as if Mustapha Kemal Pasha had taken the first step in bridging the gulf between the two towns in meeting the Constantinople editors in Smyrna. If his visit to the latter town in May materialises, the Angora Government may subsequently adopt a more helpful attitude towards its chief nerve and brain centre.

The Empire Exhibition.

Probably the most surprising thing about the British Empire Exhibition is the relatively small space that has so far been devoted to it in the Press. That is partly the fault of the authorities, who are evidently of the opinion that in the case of such a vast undertaking the publicity will be spontaneous. But even if the gates of the Empire in embryo are thronged from May to October, I shall still think the authorities wrong in not undertaking a publicity campaign on a scale commensurate with the project. Even in 1924 advertising is a subject which is misunderstood and under-estimated by the majority of people. The value of constant reiteration and repetition has yet to be realised in this country, and until it is really appreciated we shall fail to obtain the fullest results from the foreign markets.

German Competition.

Considerable comment has naturally been aroused by the report that an order for locomotives for the Indian State Railways has been placed in Germany. The contract is only for five locomotives, and there were, it appears, seventeen tenders in all, four being German. The British firms quoted the lowest possible rates, designed to keep men employed rather than to obtain profits, but, even so, the lowest British tender was 20 per cent. above the successful tender. As I have indicated, the contract is a small one, but its significance lies in the potential competition from Germany which it discloses. It is impossible for British firms to quote rates as low as the Germans can because of the prevailing conditions, and if people desire "cheap" goods the Germans are bound to obtain business at our expense. It will be the duty of the authorities to see that in the revival of German trade British interests are not allowed to suffer.

Cotton-Growing Developments.

On another page will be found an account of the recent meeting of the Empire Cotton Growing Corporation, at which a number of interesting developments were announced. It is satisfactory to know that the present Government intends to follow its predecessor in regard to the encouragement of Empire cotton-growing, for it is unquestionable that the rapid extension of cotton cultivation is one of the outstanding Imperial problems. So far as can be judged, there is no likelihood of a shortage of cotton during the present season so far as Lancashire is concerned, provided the demand keeps on its present basis. But if there should be any great development of the demand for cotton which would be the inevitable corollary of the trade revival which is evidently not far distant, then the existing supplies would be inadequate. In this connection it is not without interest to note that Russia is now in the market on a considerable scale. It is unfortunately a foregone conclusion that a shortage must come. Nothing that is now being done by this country can alter that, but the steps that are being taken will tend to ensure that nothing of the kind can happen again, and it is the duty of this country to devote increasing attention to the development of cotton cultivation until the Empire is self-supporting as regards this commodity. That day is, of course, far distant, but that very fact should be an incentive to unceasing effort in the direction of what is an eminently realisable ideal.

Rupee Exchange.

After being for quite a prolonged period well above 1s. 5d., the rupee has again begun to decline, and at the time of writing stands just below that figure. How far this movement is due to the improvement of sterling exchange in New York, as some think, and how far to Indian trade conditions, is uncertain. Probably both factors have something to do with it, and in this connection it may be noted that we have now passed through much of the period of maximum Indian trade activity.

Sir Felix Pole.

Of special interest among the new honours is the knighthood conferred on Mr. Felix Pole, general manager of the Great Western Railway. Sir Felix Pole has only recently returned from an important mission to the Sudan, where he went to report on the position with regard to the railways.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS.

NICOSIA, January 5.

Beneficial rains continue to fall. There is a small demand from Trieste for Cyprus raisins. The exportation of carobs continues, but general importation still shows a decline.

NICOSIA, January 12.

There is nothing of importance to report this week apart from the fact that climatic conditions continue to be favourable for the coming crop.

JAFFA, January 12.

The latest prices obtained in the United Kingdom for oranges show no improvement. Prices vary from 13s. to 15s. 6d. per case. Other market conditions are unchanged.

BASRAH, January 12.

Very good reports have come from the interior regarding the sowings. The market for imports shows a considerable improvement. The arrivals of grain from Hillali, Kerbela, and Nejef have been interrupted; those from the basin of Gerraf continue.

The following extracts are taken from the monthly circular of the Imperial Ottoman Bank:—

Constantinople.—The market retained its gloomy character up to the end of the year, in consequence of the uncertainty which continues to weigh on trade, the scarcity of cash, and the decrease in the purchasing power of the country, which finds only a limited relief from the exportation of local products. It is thought, however, that with the improvement in the political situation, confidence will be restored gradually and that the market will recover progressively.

Measures have been taken for the development of the productive forces of the country, and no doubt certain results have been obtained. One of the problems which specially engaged the attention of the Turkish Government was the reinstatement of its former activity to Constantinople as a port of maritime transit; conferences attended by foreign and local experts examined the means of palliating the constant falling off of that trade.

Adrianople.—Sowing operations were on a larger scale than expected. Very mild temperature favoured the sprouting of cereals.

Smyrna.—The tobacco campaign promises to exceed estimates. It is thought that 4 million kilogs. will be available for export.

Balikesser.—Sowing operations are taking place; good results are anticipated for next year's crops.

Ak-Chehir.—Thanks to the favourable temperature, sowing is being pursued actively, especially in the case of barley and wheat. Cultivators are also preparing a large area for the cultivation of opium, encouraged by the substantial profits realised from last season's crop.

Samsoun.—The tobacco market is very quiet; the weather was very favourable for autumnal sowings.

Djihan.—Owing to the satisfactory results of last crop, cultivators have been extending sowings on a large scale; the want of rain is acutely felt, however.

Adana.—Agriculture.—Cotton growers and cereal cultivators, very satisfied with the results of the last crop, are busy preparing the ground for the next sowings. Trade.—Great animation prevailed on the market during November, consequent on the important orders passed by European importers and on the continued rise in prices. Unfortunately, the smooth working of commercial transactions is hampered by the unsatisfactory state of the ginning mills and the scarcity of labour.

TURKEY.

Constantinople, February 4.

The Anatolian Railway.

The actual movement of events during the week has been slight. A jerk was put into the question of the Anatolian Railway by an apparently irrevocable decision of the inner caucus of the Assembly, the People's Party, to purchase the line from the concessionnaires and keep the exploitation in the State's hands. This decision was taken before the latest delay-action device, the so-called Council of Thirteen, had had time to present its report. The Budget, which has now been approved by the party, contains a provision of three and a half millions of pounds Turkish for this purpose, but it has not yet been explained whether this sum is to cover the whole of the purchase price nor whence the money is to come, nor whether the present owners have consented to a deal on these terms. The only thing that is really definite is that there was at once a serious break in the prices of the shares and debentures of the company on the Constantinople Bourse.

The Position at the Port.

The serious situation of the port of Constantinople and the gloomy prognostications for its future have apparently aroused quite a large number of persons in high places, and none too soon. The local Chamber of Commerce, the Maritime Chamber, etc., are preparing a report for Hassan Bey, the Minister of National Economy, regarding the measures to be taken to prevent the progressive decay of the port, and the deputies for Constantinople have sent an important letter to the Minister of Finance containing five recommendations of immediate urgency for speeding up and modernising the methods of handling shipping. If the artificial obstacles which have been created during the past five months could be cleared away that would form a good practical beginning, and the bigger and airier schemes of creating a new Liverpool and Hamburg rolled into one might be held up until they have produced a new generation of Turks capable of running such an organisation. What measures of improvement are actually to be applied we are not yet allowed to know, for Suleiman Sirri Bey says he is afraid that their premature disclosure might cause counter-measures to be taken which would paralyse their efficiency. We refuse to believe, however, that he can produce live rabbits out of his friends' kalpaks; we think that they are likely to turn out to be pups.

YUGOSLAVIA.

Liubliana, January 31.

The Fur Trade.

The fur trade of Yugoslavia is of considerable importance, and the peasants find a regular source of income during the winter months in hunting and trapping fur-bearing animals. The annual Fur Fair for Slovenia took place in Liubliana early this month. Prices ran fairly high, good marten skins fetching from 2,400 to 2,700 dinars, and fox and polecat from 200 to 300 dinars. A million dinars were realised at the principal sale, but this figure represents barely a quarter of the business done, most of the deals being concluded at various inns and hotels throughout the town. The best local fur is that of the marten, then come otter, polecat, fox, wild cat, squirrel, and the Slovene speciality, dormouse. Most of the foxes are sent abroad to be dyed before they are made up, and in view of their splendid natural russet and the fine texture of the hair, this is almost a pity. But fashion is inexorable, and the fur must be turned black before the average woman will wear it. In the south, wolves are fairly plentiful, and bears occur, but in this neighbourhood bears are rare.

COMPANY NOTES AND REPORTS.

Steaua Romana (British).

The report of Steaua Romana (British) for the year to June 30, 1923, states that the accounts include the revenue earned by the company upon its holding in the Steaua Romana (Bucharest) Company in the preceding financial year of that company. The profit was £103,726, which, with the amount brought forward, namely, £103,882, makes a total of £207,608, which it is proposed to carry forward. The loan to a Roumanian banking group on the security of shares of the Steaua Romana (Bucharest) Company falls due for payment at the end of this year. The group has applied for the extension of the loan for a period of two years, and negotiations are now proceeding with the object of endeavouring, as far as possible, to meet their views and at the same time of placing the loan on a more satisfactory basis. In addition to the security held against their principal debt, the Roumanian Group have also deposited further securities covering interest accrued to June 30, 1923.

A new Indian Chamber of Commerce has been formed at Cawnpore.

The Tata Power Company, Ltd., Bombay, has placed an order with the English Electric Company, Ltd., London, for the generating plant and station auxiliaries for their hydro-electric generating station at Bhira. The generating plant will comprise five electric generators, each driven by two high head water turbines, each set having a capacity of 30,000 h.p.

The Commercial Secretary at Teheran reports that the Council of Ministers has decided to grant a delay of ten months from November 14, 1923, to merchants using the Lion and Sun trade mark, in order that such merchants may be able to import and dispose of stocks already ordered and bearing this mark. The Commercial Secretary adds that after September 14, 1924, no further goods bearing the Lion and Sun trade mark will be allowed to enter Persia or to be sold therein.

THE TURKISH MERCANTILE MARINE.

Future Development.

Following the political reformation, Turkey's commercial activities quite likely will bring about the re-establishment of the country's merchant marine, which at the time of her entry into the War amounted to about 110,000 tons (says the American Vice-Consul at Constantinople, Mr. Edwin A. Plitt, in a recent report). Of this tonnage it is estimated that less than 50,000 tons remains, and that the greater portion of this is in bad condition or obsolete.

Turkey's most important means of communication is the sea; the country has thousands of miles of coast line, with the harbours of Constantinople and Smyrna, while Samsoun on the Black Sea will undergo an important development on completion of the projected railroads into the interior. There is, however, a lack of modern terminal facilities in all of these ports.

The comparatively small tonnage of the merchant fleet at the outbreak of the War was due primarily to the inability of the Ottoman Empire to reserve Turkish coastal trade to ships under Turkish registry. Foreign competition, under the protection of Capitulations, was detrimental to the proper development of the efforts put forth by some of the small navigation companies, with the result that their tonnage remained insignificant. An exception was the Seir Sefaine (Turkish Shipping Board), which was subsidised by the Turkish Government, and which, with its vessels of large tonnage, really became the nucleus of the country's merchant marine.

The declaration of war and the closing of the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus to the Allied Powers forced the sale at a low price of many ships then in Turkish ports. Turkish companies profited in the purchase of these ships, as well as in obtaining all transportation. An exceptional demand was also created for military transportation in the Marmora Sea.

This sudden expansion was checked, however, through war losses, the Russians in particular succeeding in sinking some of the company's largest ships in the Black Sea. These were later replaced by Russian ships seized in Turkish ports, several of which have since become unserviceable. In addition, other war losses caused such a diminution that at the time of the Armistice the Turkish merchant marine had hardly made a step ahead. Statistics compiled by the Turkish Chamber of Commerce place the war losses, including sailing craft, at 69,016 tons. Of this amount 63,516 tons represents the loss in steamships and tugboats.

Owing to the Allied occupation, during which time a great deal of ship tonnage changed hands and registry, there is a lack of any trustworthy statistics regarding the strength of the Turkish merchant marine. The Turkish Chamber of Commerce, therefore, has made the following compilation of vessels, as at November 1, 1923 (the figures in brackets representing the tonnage):—Seir Sefaine, 35 (37,494); Chirket-i-Hairie, 27 (4,815); Golden Horn Shipping Co., 16 (1,397); other companies, 47 (30,242); miscellaneous vessels in port of Constantinople, 17 (4,300); tugboats, etc., 123 (1,200); steam barks, 190 (3,500); total, 455 (82,948).

Of these companies, the Seir Sefaine is the only one possessing large vessels, six of its ships exceeding 3,000 tons; but its equipment is limited and leaves much to be desired in effective service. The largest vessel of any of the other companies does not exceed 1,000 tons.

Now that Turkey has limited its coastal shipping exclusively to vessels under Turkish registry, where heretofore Greece and Italy figured most prominently, a new impetus has been given to the development of a national merchant marine. This effort to build up a purely Turkish domestic carrying trade appears to have been without other discrimination against foreign shipping hitherto except in the matter of a sanitary tax of 5 piastres per ton on foreign vessels where Turkish vessels pay only 2 piastres.

The Seir Sefaine has inaugurated a service between Black Sea, Ægean, and Mediterranean ports, and is trying to augment its tonnage through the purchase of additional units and to improve its methods of operation. At present a great need is felt for large-sized vessels to handle the passenger traffic. This, however, is only temporary, the future of the country's merchant fleet being dependent largely upon the demand created by the development of Turkey's resources and industries.

TURKISH GUM TRAGACANTH PRODUCTION.

Gum tragacanth is the product of several species of shrubs, genus Astragalus. The shrubs grow to a height of three or four feet, and are found in a wild state on the highlands and mountains of Turkey, Persia, and Syria (says an American Consular report). No special cultivation has ever been attempted. The greater part of the Anatolian crop is gathered by peasants each year during the months of June and July.

The most important regions producing gum tragacanth are Cæsarea, Angora, Yosgad, Karaman, Michalitch, Konia, Karahissar, Everek, Nigde, and Nidel. The first five centres named probably produce the best qualities. When collected and dried, the gum is packed in sacks, taken to the nearest village, and sold to jobbers, who are usually the agents of the exporters in the large ports. Thereupon it is transported to Constantinople or Smyrna, where it is graded for exportation. The entire product is exported.

Tragacanth is graded according to quality, irrespective of the point of origin, and usually according to the following classification:—Firsts (flores or extras)—the finest white, translucent flakes; seconds—yellowish flakes of good quality; thirds (Biondos)—clear, yellow flakes; fourths—dark yellow and opaque gum; fifths (Scarto and terreuses)—flakes of all cuts which are damaged by rain and dirt, mixed and sold at a low price.

The gum comes from the producer in sacks containing about 60 okes each (oke equals 2.8 lbs.). The finest qualities are repacked for export in wooden cases containing about 120 kilos (kilo equals 2.2 lbs.), while the inferior grades are shipped in jute sacks, 75 to 100 kilos to the sack.

In the years immediately preceding the World War production is estimated to have been about 5,000 to 6,000 sacks annually. During the War it was greatly neglected, and barely reached 1,500 sacks. Most of the peasants were in the army, and transportation was inadequate. Very small amounts were shipped to the central European countries until the last two years of the War, when the annual exports were from 800 to 1,000 sacks. Production rose steadily after the Armistice, and is now approximately 5,000 sacks per annum.

The major part of the 1922 exports of Anatolian gum tragacanth went to Germany, and Belgium and France received the balance. The total shipments from Constantinople during 1922 did not exceed 1,000 sacks. The reasons for this decrease in exportation are varied. First, the general demand in America and Europe during the year was limited. Prices on the Constantinople market were lower than those quoted from the interior. The producers were disposed to hold their goods rather than let them go at the lower prices. Since the Armistice there has been much price fluctuation. Prices in the interior lead those on the market in Constantinople by a large margin. The producers, in consequence, have had little faith in the Turkish paper pound, and have been unwilling to reduce quotations.

Definite information regarding the 1923 crop is not available. Reports which reach the market from farmer correspondents of local importers, and from general sources, are rather contradictory. However, it is believed in authoritative circles that the new crop will yield approximately 5,000 sacks. Climatic conditions are reported favourable to its harvesting. The Greco-Turkish War had slight effect upon the production of gum tragacanth, inasmuch as about 60 to 70 per cent. of Anatolian tragacanth is produced in the Province of Cæsarea, which was only indirectly affected by the last war.

It is generally understood that considerable stocks of various crops have been accumulating in the interior since 1920. This is due to the policy of the local importers, who only import from the interior small quantities at a time, to prevent flooding the local market, and therefore the resultant slump in prices. Considering the 1,600 sacks on hand—about 5,000 sacks from the new crop and that accrued from past years in the interior—Turkey might easily equal, and possibly eclipse, the pre-war exportation figures.

A certain amount of Persian gum tragacanth comes to the Constantinople and Smyrna markets and is re-exported. This gum is of a very fine quality, being white and translucent, and is produced in flakes and ribbons. In many respects it resembles the Anatolian firsts, but has a higher yield than the latter. Persian gum is used chiefly in medicine and in the better grades of confectionery. Syrian gum, small quantities of which used to be handled in Constantinople, comes in thin, vermiform pieces. It is very translucent, yields more than Anatolian gum, and is used for purposes similar to those of the Persian gum. Bitlis gum or "hog tragacanth" is the product of a species which grows in the region of Bitlis and throughout Kurdistan, and is used largely for dressing and stiffening rough cloth materials, such as jute sacking. This variety is not available at the present time on the Constantinople market.

LIVERPOOL COTTON REPORT.

Business on Improved Scale.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended February 6:—

Egyptian Spot.— A much improved business has taken place during the past week, the estimated sales proving larger than anything we have seen during the past two months. There has been little indication in the daily inquiry to point towards such a revival, and the inference is that a fairly large proportion has been done on local speculators' account. There have been many rumours of buying on Russian export account, but these appear to have had their foundation more on the American side of the maket than on ours. Markets here are still keeping fairly steady, and certainly on Monday last there was a distinct inclination on the part of the trade to come in and buy cotton. Unfortunately, interest appeared to die away as rapidly as it had sprung up. Nevertheless, there does seem to be rather more business about, apart from speculative buying, not only on the spot, but also for forward delivery.

A rather curious feature, taken in conjunction with the above, has been a further marked increase in the demand for low cotton (this, as a rule, is not a good trade sign), but the results of the inquiry still continue to be very meagre. In Sakellaridis, there is little fresh to report. Interest in the better cotton has flagged, and the bulk of the business done has been at from 50 to 150 "on March." There is a fairly plentiful supply here, at the moment, of G.F. to F.G.F. Sakellaridis, but a big percentage of it consists of wasty cotton of very indifferent staple, and good staple lots are becoming increasingly scarce. Between fair and good fair a large quantity of cotton has lately come into sight, and is being pressed for sale.

The market for Uppers still continues to be somewhat irregular, but the tendency here is, undoubtedly, a hardening one, and quotations of Upper (and, incidentally, of Brown) have widened out another 40 points as compared with Sakellaridis. F.G.F. Uppers, good staple, changed hands yesterday at 40 points off March contracts, and this was considered here as a reasonable basis. For Good Uppers, up to 23.50 (or 90 on March) has been asked and obtained, fairly freely. A larger proportion of the inquiry has leaned towards upper cotton this week than has recently been the case.

In Sudan cotton, a large business has taken place, chiefly in the White varieties. Prices paid touched up to 55 on March Egyptian. Brown and White Egyptian have been neglected. Forwardings to spinner for the week ending 1st instant were returned as 12,487 bales. Estimated sales: 4,000 Egyptian and 3,650 bales Sudan. Quotations of Sakellaridis are unchanged. Brown and Upper are advanced 40 points. F.G.F. Sakellaridis to-day 23.35d.

Sir Charles Eric Hambro, at present deputy-governor of the Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation, has been elected sub-governor, and Mr. C. L. Dalziel has been elected deputy-governor of the Corporation.

Contracts for Pulverised Fuel Plant.

The Union d'Electricité, which has power stations at Gennevilliers and Vitry, near Paris, for the supply of electric power to the city and its environs, has placed another large order for pulverised fuel plant with the company associated with Vickers and International Combustion Engineering, Ltd., of London. It is for the power station at Gennevilliers, which is now worked with B. and W. and Stirling boilers having multiple-retort and chain-grate stokers. For the new extension the engineers of the Union d'Electricité have decided upon Ladd-Belleville boilers and Lopulco plant for pulverised fuel firing, and this decision is significant in view of the fact that the mechanical stokers already working in the station represent the very last word in modern practice.

The following are some leading particulars of the new contract:—Four boilers of Ladd-Belleville type, each of 19,500 sq. ft. heating surface; to work at 440 lbs. per sq. in. and give 150,000 lbs. of steam per hour at full load, also an overload of 240,000 lbs. for two hours. This overload is only made possible by the boilers being fired with coal in powdered form. The fuels, on which the guarantees are given, show a wide variation, in one case of 11 per cent. of ash and 17 per cent. of volatiles, and in the other 20 per cent. of ash and 8 per cent. of volatiles.

The pulverised fuel plant will include eight Lopulco gravity coal driers, eight Raymond roller mills, each to grind 6 tons of coal per hour, forty-eight Lopulco variable speed feeders, and also burners of fish-tail patterns. The combustion chamber of each boiler will be of the Combustion Company's special design, having air-cooled walls and ports to admit the preheated air to various parts of the flame, to ensure complete combustion of the fuel. The chamber is also fitted with Lopulco water screen to prevent the ash from slagging, and enable it to be easily handled. This new contract is in a sense a repeat order, because similar plant is already in hand for the power station at Vitry, owned by the same power company.

One of the companies associated with Vickers and International Combustion Engineering, Ltd., has received a contract to equip the new power plant of the Société Metallurgique de Hoboken, near Antwerp, with boilers arranged to use pulverised coal and Lopulco equipment. This is the second large order recently placed in Belgium for such plant, the other being for a power station at Charbonnages de Beeringen, in Limbourg, which has four Ladd boilers, each 7,000 sq. ft. heating surface, and enough pulverising plant to supply also eight existing B. and W. boilers.

The British Empire Exhibition.

Those who saw the Wembley site a few months ago and compared its half-ruined city appearance at that time with the scene it presents to-day have had a unique opportunity of seeing what British engineering skill can accomplish in a short space of time. The Exhibition is still far from complete, but as it stands it is a marvellous achievement, and it is perfectly clear that the finished product will be well worthy to rank among the wonders of the world. Building after building in graceful outline, great stretches of landscape terminating in an architectural triumph, it is really a marvellous vista that will be displayed to the visitors from the end of April onwards. It will be as near perfection as an Empire in miniature could be, and one envies those who will spend a few days exploring the bypaths of Empire at Wembley.

TENDERS INVITED.

Tenders are invited for the following contracts, and must be made by the dates mentioned.

(Particulars of tenders marked D.O.T. are to be obtained from the Department of Overseas Trade, 35, Old Queen Street, S.W.)

Egypt.

Rope, etc.—The Financial Secretary, Egyptian Army, War Office, Cairo, invites tenders for the supply of rope damascene, twine flax coarse for packages, cochineal, tifta red dye in lumps, sacks jute G.S., etc., to the Department of Ordnance Services, Egyptian Army, Citadel, Cairo. March 8.

Timber.—The Superintendent of Stores, Egyptian State Railways, Telegraphs and Telephones, Cairo, invites tenders for the supply of timber for planking. March 11.

Electric Power Stations.—The Egyptian Ministry of the Interior is calling for tenders for electrical installations at the following places (the adjudication dates being given in brackets):—Benha (March 20), Miniet el Kamh (April 3), Beni-Mazar (April 10), Chebin el Kom (March 27). The plant required comprises Diesel-driven D.C. generators, together with transmission lines. Complete tenders for each station are to be submitted. (D.O.T.)

Steel Roofs and Shelter for Station.—The general manager, Egyptian State Railways, Telegraphs and Telephones, Cairo Station, invites tenders for the construction of steel roofs and shelter for Alexandria new station. May 1.

Cotton Waste.—The general manager, Egyptian State Railways, Telegraphs, and Telephones, Cairo Station, invites tenders for the supply of 250 metric tons of coloured cotton waste. March 20.

Bulgaria.

Tools, etc.—The Bulgarian Ministry of Railways invites tenders for the supply and delivery, c.i.f. Bulgarian port, of various small tools, grindstones, brushes, etc. February 22. (D.O.T.)

EMPIRE COTTON-GROWING CORPORATION.

Towards the end of last year the British Empire Cotton Growing Corporation prepared, at the request of the President of the Board of Trade in the late Government, a memorandum setting out the several means whereby in their opinion cotton growing within the Empire could be considerably and rapidly developed. In this memorandum they stated that they attached special importance to increased facilities for transport in tropical Africa, and emphasised particularly the need for a railway giving Jinja in Uganda direct access to the sea at Mombasa, and the desirability of repairing the light railway at Lindi, in Tanganyika. They also suggested that the possibility of developing the Mwanza area in Tanganyika by means of a railway to Tabora on the Central Railway, and of opening up the potentially rich cotton area of north-west Nigeria should be carefully explored.

At their meeting last week the executive committee of the Corporation learned with the greatest satisfaction that the Colonial Office had informed the Governors of Kenya and Uganda that Parliament would be asked to sanction a loan of £3,500,000 free of interest for five years, to be repaid in thirty-seven annual instalments, and to be secured on the revenue and assets of Kenya and Uganda. The greater part of the loan will be devoted to extending the present railway from Uasin Gichu, in Kenya, to Luzinga, a station on the Busoga railway north of Jinja. This railway will not only greatly facilitate the movement of the Uganda cotton crop, which is expected this season to exceed 100,000 bales, but will develop the industry in the North Kavirondo country through which the railway will pass.

The grant of a sum of £50,000 to Tanganyika has also been approved by the Imperial Government for the purpose of reconditioning the light railway at Lindi, and extending it to the coast with a view to assisting the cotton-growing industry in that area. This intimation was given before the change of Government, but it was understood that the present Government have endorsed the scheme in both cases. It was further reported that the Corporation's suggestions of a railway to Mwanza, in Tanganyika, and another in Nigeria had been referred by the Colonial Office for examination by the local governments. The executive committee of the Corporation passed a cordial vote of thanks to the members of the late Government for the ready and sympathetic consideration they had always given to the proposals of the Corporation, and for their recognition of the importance of developing cotton growing in the Empire.

Among other matters decided at the meeting of the committee, Mr. F. R. Parnell, Economic Botanist to the Government of Madras, was appointed to a post as plant breeder under the Corporation. He will proceed to South Africa shortly to work under Mr. S. Milligan, who has resigned his post as Agricultural Adviser to the Government of India to take up an appointment with the Corporation to advise the Government of the Union of South Africa on all matters connected with cotton growing. The Corporation promised General Smuts that they would supply his Government with a small expert staff, and they are confident that the development of cotton growing in South Africa could not be entrusted to more competent hands than those of Mr. Milligan and of the experts who will work under his direction. The Corporation have also decided to appoint a small committee of engineers to examine and report on various forms of motor transport.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Little Change in Futures.

The Alexandria Commercial Company, in their report for the week ended February 1, state :--

Since our last report, the futures market has fluctuated very little, but at the close of the week the tone became steadier. There is again nothing of interest to report. New York has been quiet; it looks as if both speculation and trade in America have not taken of late much interest in the market. In Liverpool, business in Egyptian during the last few days has been slightly more active; the fact that prices there are so much cheaper compared to Alexandria is naturally a reason explaining this activity. The demand from abroad has been rather limited, but it has shown some signs of expansion these last two days. Ashmouni, despite its dearness, has been much sought after, and the difference between February Ashmouni and March Sakel has further narrowed, and stands to-day at $1.71 against $1.92 a week ago. This firmness is due to the limited supply of uppers on the spot market, especially of the grades above good fair, and to the strength of the holders. Arrivals from the Interior are falling off, while exports continue on a large scale, and the result is that the available supplies in Egypt are steadily decreasing. In view of the strength of the statistical position, we do not foresee much lower prices in the near future, but, on the other hand, unless the demand from abroad expands, we cannot expect any considerable rise. The week's arrivals amount to 106,070 krs., against exports 180,737 krs.; the stock stands at 1,840,637 krs.

Spot.—We have had a quiet week at Minet el Bassal, though towards the end of the week demand from abroad improved a little. Sales amount to about 10,500 B/s, of which we estimate 7,300 B/s Sakel, 3,000 B/s Uppers, 100 B/s Brown and Pilion, and 100 B/s White. Arrivals and exports are both rather less than last week. The stock shows a further decrease.

Sakellarides.—All grades have been dealt in, and there has been a continued demand for the medium and rather low qualities. Prices of spot against contracts are unchanged, but inclined to ease a little.

Uppers.—Business has been done in all styles. Prices of spot against contracts are inclined to ease for the higher grades, and are firm with a hardening tendency in the medium and lower styles.

Brown and Pilion.—A small business has been done at about last week's rates.

White.—A moderate business has been done. Prices of spot against contracts are nominal and unchanged.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Opposition to Control Scheme.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended February 9 states :—

A very unsatisfactory week has been experienced, the volume of inquiry being greatly diminished, and the contracts actually booked comparatively few. It is difficult to account for this sudden quietness after the activity prevailing during the middle of January, and one can only assume that buyers abroad, although compelled to replenish stocks from time to time, have not sufficient confidence in present prices to enter into engagements which would involve placing substantial contracts for future deliveries.

Yarn.—There is nothing of special interest to report with regard to this section. The offers made are poor, and the total business done must have been small. Spinners both of American and Egyptian have lost ground. The control scheme referred to in previous reports is meeting with opposition in certain quarters, and the indications at the moment are that any attempt to apply it would be ineffective unless Parliamentary authority were obtained to make it compulsory, a procedure which would naturally involve considerable delay.

Cloth.— Manufacturers of cloth have had a very disappointing week, such purchases as have been made being mostly small lots for early delivery. Exceptionally, China shows a little improvement, but regarding other markets the reports are uniformly poor.

Raw Cotton.—A weaker tendency has been noticeable, with somewhat wider fluctuations than in the preceding week. Owing to the reduced consumption, there appears to be less fear of any shortage occurring at the end of the present season. Closing prices yesterday were as follows :—American Fully Middling, 19.39d. ; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 22.90d.

SMYRNA FRUIT MARKET.

Messrs. C. J. Giraud and Co., of Smyrna, report as follows for the week ended January 26 :—

The arrivals of sultanas on the Smyrna market are estimated at 36,400 tons, and the sales are put at 34,500 tons. Business this week has been restricted to narrow lines. Prices are unchanged. Dealers are holding out for full prices for their remaining stocks.

His Majesty's Commercial Secretary at Constantinople reports that the precautions against plague imposed on arrivals from Malaga have been withdrawn.

The traffic receipts of the Egyptian Delta Light Railways for the ten days ended January 20 amounted to £E9,987, making the total from April 1 £E265,821.

The traffic receipts of the South Indian Railway Company for the week ended January 5 amounted to Rs. 9,19,925, making the total from April 1 Rs. 3,88,18,176.

Lord Meston will preside at a meeting of the Royal Society of Arts (Indian Section) on Friday, when a paper on "Salt Manufacture in India" will be read by Sir Richard M. NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Heat at Luxor.

Any discussion of the troubles that have arisen around the tomb of Tutankhamen should be prefaced by the remark that the squabbles of individuals of different nationalities need not involve their respective Governments, and should not be allowed to impair good relations between their countries. As is invariably the case in disputes of this kind, there have been faults on both sides. The immediate cause of the altercation that has led to the closing of the tomb directly after the presence of the king's sarcophagus had been determined was Mr. Howard Carter's very natural desire that the families or wives of his collaborators should be given the opportunity of a special visit to the tomb. He had been to Cairo, and made an agreement with the officials concerned regarding the programme to be observed in connection with the opening of the sarcophagus, and the list of those who were to be admitted subsequently to the tomb as special visitors. He was unable in Cairo to secure the necessary permission for the families of his collaborators, and when he made a further attempt from Luxor the Egyptian authorities held him to the letter of his agreement, and refused their consent. The refusal was emphasised with a display of force outside the tomb; whereupon Mr. Carter decided to close the tomb to everybody, and the Antiquities Service has now made a further move by closing it even to Mr. Carter. In view of the fact that relations between the excavator and the authorities had not been very cordial and that a formal agreement was found necessary to minimise the chances of serious friction, it was unfortunate that Mr. Carter should have found himself obliged to try to go beyond the strict terms of that agreement, and so challenged a trial of strength.

Pique and Publicity.

The real cause of the trouble lies in the circumstances of the discovery of Tutankhamen's tomb. Public interest in a find of this nature was bound to be very great; the first effort to satisfy it would be by the despatch to Luxor of innumerable newspaper correspondents, and their unregulated presence at the tomb would have made the work of the excavators impossible. The late Lord Carnarvon, foreseeing this, and being a man of business, made special arrangements for the publicity side of his discovery. Although these arrangements appear to have worked well from the excavators' point of view, they gave considerable umbrage in the newspaper world, and the Egyptian Government has had to stand much blame in the matter. Moreover, the magnitude and importance of Lord Carnarvon's discovery raised in an acute form the question of proprietorship over archæological finds in Egypt, because in this case every single article in the King's crowded storehouses was of value, and, as it were, worth wrangling over. To all this must be added the fact that the discovery was made by an Englishman in territory owned by the Egyptian Government, whose Director of Antiquities is a Frenchman. Even if French archæologists had not thought it necessary in such a country as Afghanistan to claim the exclusive right of excavating, to the grave prejudice of their own science, it would hardly occasion surprise that they should feel some disappointment that the finest gem of Egypt's mine of archæological wealth had yielded itself to the spade of an Englishman. Accordingly, Mr. Carter's work in the Valley of the Kings has experienced a stormy course, in spite of the fact that the richness and importance of his discovery ought to have brought together all the parties concerned in a single-minded endeavour to subordinate all pettiness to the cause of archæological research. In siding with its officials against Mr. Carter, the Egyptian Cabinet can make out a technical case in its own favour, but it shows an unfortunate lack of appreciation of the exceptional services rendered to Egypt and to archæology by Mr. Carter—services which ought to have ensured him exceptional consideration and treatment.

The Future of Greece.

It is to be hoped in the interests of Greece that no party or section of the people will adopt, in connection with the forthcoming plebiscite, the foolish custom, so common in the Balkans, of abstaining from an electoral contest by way of protest against the Government of the day. Such tactics merely play into the hands of the party in power, as the latter can point to the result of the poll as evidence of its hold on the country, and it rarely has much difficulty in making light of the allegations of those who have not taken part in the election. The Greek Royalists, it is stated, are debating whether they should or should not take part in the plebiscite which is to decide the future status of Greece. If they do not take part, on whatever excuse, however specious, they will have only themselves to blame for the result. Abroad it will be taken for granted that the monarchists feared a trial of strength, and that public opinion in Greece has, in fact, veered round to a republic. Instead of debating whether they ought to take part in the polling, the monarchists ought to be hard at work organising the country for the plebiscite, and proving to the faint-hearted that there is still a moderate and conservative element capable of steering the Ship of State into smooth waters. In the meantime, the Republicans are showing very clearly that they on their part have little faith in their success in any fair test of public opinion, as they are leaving no stone unturned with a view to forcing on the country a verdict in favour of a republic before the plebiscite can be held.

Italy, Britain, and Greece.

In commenting upon the conventions between Italy and Yugoslavia, a correspondent on another page sets out the Italian point of view, and discusses possible developments arising out of the Italo-Yugoslav understanding. He suggests that Signor Mussolini may find, or may, at least, consider, Greece an obstacle to a close understanding between Italy and Great Britain. The argument, in so many words, is that the Italian programme requires that Yugoslavia should be encouraged to avert her glance from the Adriatic. A natural outlet presents itself to her in Salonika, and Signor Mussolini is supposed to be anticipating the day when Yugoslavia and Bulgaria will make common cause to deprive Greece of Salonika and Western Thrace. When this happens, Italy is anxious that Great Britain should not attempt to thwart destiny as a result of her friendship with Greece, and accordingly she offers Italian in the place of Greek friendship in the Mediterranean, if Great Britain will "disinterest" herself in Greece. The scheme certainly deserves to be called an interesting one, and may be commended to the attention of all the chancelleries concerned—in particular, to those Greeks who are bent on estranging their country's friends. Possibly, a republican coup de théâtre is all that is needed to save Signor Mussolini all anxiety, and to enable him to give effect to his programme in the immediate future. Greece, on the other hand, cannot complain that she has not been forewarned. Our correspondent admits that a Balkan Confederation might upset Signor Mussolini's scheme, but he would regard such a contingency as a miracle. We shall see. Much depends on whether Greek politicians will continue to fiddle until Greece is wholly consumed.

The Little Entente.

A book just published by Herr von Boroviczeny, a member of the suite of the late Emperor Charles of Austria-Hungary, giving an account of the latter's attempt in 1921 to recover the Crown of St. Stephen, contains a passage of peculiar interest to the members of the Little Entente. This passage, as quoted by The Times, is as follows:—

> His Majesty had received an invitation from M. Briand to attempt to recover the reins of government in his own country—that is to say, in Budapest. This invitation was the result of a long-standing connection between the Monarch and the French Cabinet. M. Briand assured him of French support, if he succeeded in bringing about a fait accompli. He admitted that after His Majesty had taken over the Government there would be a storm of protest from the States of the Little Entente, but His Majesty should not let himself be frightened by any of them. Everything would turn out as in the Greek Restoration. Nor must His Majesty take the protests of the Entente, including those of the French Government, amiss. For the sake of form, protests would have to be made; but protests could soon be transformed into "endeavours for the maintenance of peace," and they would thus succeed in keeping the Little Entente under, even if it wished to intervene.

The author adds that France, in view of the fact that Italy, who had brought the Little Entente into being, had decided to support the candidature of the Archduke Joseph, hoped that, by having effected the restoration of the Emperor Charles, she would cause Italy to forfeit her influence in the Succession States, and would herself step into Italy's place.

Intrigue or Strength.

If, as seems likely, it proves difficult to challenge the accuracy of Herr von Boroviczeny's information, the lesson for the individual States of the Little Entente is obvious. So long as they attach themselves to the orbit of a Great Power they are brought within the meshes of the intrigues which must now be regarded as inseparable from Central European politics. For Czecho-Slovakia there is, perhaps, no alternative. She appeared to wish to find one by creating the Little Entente; but Dr. Benesh has clearly stated that he has always had in view an outer ring of alliances, and the Franco-Czechoslovakian Treaty has followed in due course. The position of Roumania and Yugoslavia is quite different. Self-interest as well as every other material consideration, links them with South-Eastern Europe; only false pride or dangerous ambitions can lure them into Central European entanglements. Czecho-Slovakia has already shown them the first step on the slippery path. In the series of conventions with Italy, no serious commitments have been entered into by Yugoslavia, which is still free to concentrate on the great desideratum—a Balkan Federation—that will create in Europe an entirely new "Great Power," whose interests will be essentially pacific, and which, by blocking the road to Eastern aspirations on the part of other Continental Powers, will introduce a steadying influence in European politics. Roumania's interests in this matter are identical with those of Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, and Greece.

Bulgarian Parties.

The position of the Bulgarian Government is too indeterminate, in spite of a big Parliamentary majority, to allow it to regard the defection of the Socialist Party with any complacency. Ostensibly the Socialists are dissatisfied with their representation in the Ministry, and on the refusal of the Prime Minister to grant them another Ministerial seat they have withdrawn their support and compelled the one Socialist member of the Cabinet, the Minister for Railways, to resign. It is too early to gauge the effect, if any, of this move on the political situation in Bulgaria. No one pretends that the present composition of the Sobranye reflects the real views of the country. If it does not, there is always ground for the fear that an attempt will be made to upset the false verdict by unconstitutional means. The Socialists are hardly likely to become a middle party; they will more probably make common cause with the existing Left, which comprises Agrarians and Communists. If Bulgarian politics should take on a green-red complexion, the fault will be due to a great extent to the folly of "making" elections and then acting on the belief that the Parliamentary representation resulting is a true index of public opinion.

The New Turkey.

A number of straws in Turkey seem to indicate the way the political wind is blowing. The Angora Assembly has granted an amnesty, with restoration of full civil rights, not only to the three Constantinople editors, who had been acquitted, but also to Lutfi Fikri Bey, the leader of the Turkish Bar, who had been condemned by the Tribunal of Independence. The prospect of an understanding between Mustapha Kemal Pasha and the Committee of Union and Progress is openly canvassed, and it may be taken for granted that such a movement would have the effect of moving Angora further towards the Bosphorus than it would take Constantinople in the direction of Anatolia. Whether a modus vivendi is to be sought at the expense of the Khalifate remains to be seen. It is noted that the first steps towards a rapprochement have been accompanied by a renewal of the attacks on the Imperial family; but these may be merely a means of letting off steam to distract the attention of Angora from the real business in hand. The most important piece of news, however, is the proposal of the committee engaged in drawing up the Constitutional Charter that henceforth all Turkish subjects, without distinction of race or religion, should be called Turks, and enjoy exactly the same legal footing. Such a step would connote the triumph of practical common sense over tradition and chauvinism.

An Anglo-Arab Treaty.

King Hussein's visit to Transjordania will not have been in vain if it results in bringing to light a forgotten treaty-in-the-making. Some months ago the world was informed that an agreement was about to be signed between Great Britain and the Hejaz. A few finishing touches only were required before the document could be published. A patient public waited—and forgot; and so, it would seem, did many other people more directly concerned in the negotiations. As far as the British Government was concerned, it had said its say, and waited for the reply of King Hussein. Even if there had not been a change of Ministry in Great Britain, it would hardly have been seemly to press for a communication. Dr. Naji el Assil, Diplomatic Agent in London of King Hussein, had also done his share. He had sent the draft treaty to Mecca in November, and had no reason to notice any omission on the part of the Hejaz Government to acknowledge by telegram or letter its receipt. If King Hussein had remained in his own country, probably nothing more would ever have been heard of the all-but concluded treaty. Fortunately, however, he went to Amman, and his alleged views on the independence of Palestine prompted Dr. Naji el Assil to inquire after his draft of that document. His important dispatch, it now appears, had never reached the King. It has been traced as far as Jeddah, where the British Agent handed it over to the Arab authorities, but the last stage between Jeddah and Mecca proved, as it has done for many another pilgrim, the stumbling block. A duplicate message is now on its way, and it is to be hoped that nothing said or done at Amman will have changed the course of history.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

The Dock Strike.

The inventor of statistics, especially of percentages, must have a very heavy load on his conscience to-day. Practically all recent strikes have been fought round the accursed things, so that the ordinary public are more or less convinced that it is possible to prove almost anything with them. If one could believe these wretched figures, one would think that the dockers, who struck on Saturday, were completely justified; even without such belief, many people are on their side.

But, as I have said before (ever since the Labour Government came into power, in fact, for somebody or other seems to have been striking or threatening to strike), it is unwise to dogmatise about the rights and wrongs of any strike. Most men are incompetent to deal with a strike on its merits—at any rate, on its merits as presented in the newspapers, and generally have a sweeping conviction that the men are always wrong or are always right. In this case, as far as one can judge, the sympathy of the public is with the men; but, of course, that fact will have no effect on the duration of the strike. Certainly there has been plenty of time to consider the situation, and in men like Tillett and Bevin the employers have people whom they can, or could if they would, trust.

One curious fact about this strike, which I have not noticed at other times, is the plea by the masters that if they were to yield to the employees' demands it would affect adversely on other industries. Such open assertion of the solidarity of Capital is, I think, a new feature in industrial disputes; it suggests very much that the thin figure of Justice is getting pushed further and further into the background.

To suppose, moreover, because a Labour Government is in power that the strike should soon be settled is unfair and certainly unwarranted.

Poplar.

Mr. Asquith seems nowadays to specialise in barren triumphs. The other day he discomfited the Government very considerably with his penetrating remarks on the Poplar fiasco. But to what end? There is no indication that he will follow his rebuke of Mr. Wheatley with a command to his followers to defeat the Government in a vote, and it is difficult to see what the Government is going to do about it.

Poplar is not the easy question that some people imagine, and, furthermore, the country will not go to the dogs if the extremists of this unfortunate district get their way. In any case, the Government has promised to exhibit a certain elasticity of principle which will surely cover all contingencies of the Poplar muddle, and will not be perished until the Liberals or the Conservatives show a willingness to form a Government. And that seems a long way off.

The Capital Levy.

There are those who can reconcile the idealism of the present Government with that elasticity of principle to which I have referred. They watch without dismay the jettisoning of one thing after another, and are apparently content with the mere fact that the Labour vessel is still afloat. Not for them to quibble with the Government's decision not to attempt the introduction of the Capital Levy, or to quarrel with the intention to treat a possible defeat over Poplar as no question of principle. Is it not curious how idealists in office become the most practical of politicians? If the Government is prepared to give up all that formerly distinguished it from its enemies, what harm can encompass it?

Wild Wales Again.

Last week in the Commons we had some quite amusing times. The clear weather seemed to have brightened the intellects of members, and we had the delightful spectacle of quotation of verse in the House. Far from being daunted by the recent turn of events, Mr. Baldwin had the capriciousness to steal from Rossetti, but later in the week we were even more regaled by some wrongly attributed verse.

This occurred in the discussion of the Bill for Local Option in Wales, where, it appears, they want to have a referendum every three years, the majority to decide whether people shall be allowed to drink intoxicants of any kind, whether in clubs or in public-houses. The reading of the Bill was defeated, as it deserved to be, after one of its sponsors had the effrontery to attribute to a sixteenth-century poet the immortal lines of Henry Aldrich :—

> If all be true that I do think,
> There are five reasons we should drink;
> Good wine—a friend—or being dry—
> Or lest we should be by and by—
> Or any other reason why.

It was a Liberal from this barbarian Principality who was audacious enough, first to quote only three of the lines, then to misquote them (inaccurate reporting is out of the question, for it is inconceivable that all the reporters did not know the correct version by heart), and, finally, to suggest that their philosophy was not wholly desirable.

The Modern Valentine.

St. Valentine's Day will never again be what it once was, for we now believe neither in saints nor in the necessity of special days for the exercise of amorous tendencies. The modern revival of this very pretty custom is taking the practical form of having extra-special meals on this day. All the hotels were busy on February 14 with Valentine menus, in which, it is said, were concealed some very up-to-date examples of love philtres. At any rate, the hotels made a tremendous business of the Day, and as they ordain so do we order our lives.

One did see in the inferior shops a pathetic attempt to reproduce the pre-War spirit of St. Valentine by means of the crudest kind of picture-postcard depicting the sagittal piercing of hearts and less reputable methods of securing maidens' affections; and one was rather glad that such vulgarity and silliness have for ever disappeared from our top and midst.

The Horse and Petrol.

Although it complicates our traffic problem, the return of the horse to the roads is a delightful fact to record. Nothing was sadder to see, just after the War, than the gradual supersession by the motor of the horses which are a peculiar pride of this country. But it is stated that for short distances the horse is without doubt displacing the motor in the conveyance of goods. The shire horse and the wagon are cheaper than the motor, and not only in London, but in the provinces as well, the noblest of creatures is coming back. If only the demand for horses were sufficient to make the petrol combines reduce their prices!

The Opera Season.

The season of the British National Opera Company at Covent Garden ended with gusto on Saturday, and, to judge by the effect on the wireless, the walls must have shaken with enthusiasm. No doubt the B.N.O.C. have gained a certain popularity, but only, apparently, in the operas which are always popular—"La Bohème," "Cavalleria Rusticana," "I Pagliacci," and the rest. Mozart, the Russian operas, and the British compositions have, it is said, been played to half-empty houses. In other words, the B.N.O.C. has failed to educate the British public.

However, it really seems that the threatened visit of the Viennese is not to come off, so that our own people will have yet another chance. Most of the papers seem to be rather piqued about it, but the more general view appears to be summed up in Tom Hood's words :—

> I like your German singers well,
> But hate them too, and for this reason,
> Although they always sing in time,
> They often sing quite out of season.

Cruft's Dog Show.

The great Dog Show was this year larger than ever, but was chiefly remarkable for the evidence of the increasing popularity of the bigger kind of dog. Great Danes, mastiffs, and so on were very abundant, and it was said that they were owned very considerably by women. It is possible that the day of the small dog will come again, but it will not be for some time. The two dogs that the War really introduced to us—the Alsatian and the Saluki—were well represented.

Washington and Luxor.

For once in a way people have been during the past week interested in affairs outside their own country. They have been quite greedy for news of the oil scandal in America; it brings them back to those dear old far-off days of the Marconi scandal, when all the world had it proved that a democracy was incorruptible. They are being told that, next to their own, the American democracy is the most virtuous of the world's democracies; and they are beginning to wonder. . . .

Over matters in Luxor they seem divided; certainly they are not so indignant as the Press says they should be. Of course, it may only be that they want something new in the way of pictures in The Times and the Daily Mail. . . .

Alter Ego.

NEWS IN BRIEF.

A Teheran message says that the Persian Parliament was reopened on February 11. It had not sat since last July.

General Gouraud, Military Governor of Paris, was last week elected a member of the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles Lettres.

Expenditure on the Waziristan operations in the last three years was £11,555,000, £7,111,000, and £5,222,000 respectively, exclusive of political charges.

It is announced that the Italian troops have occupied the oasis of Ghadames, 300 miles south-west of Tripoli, thus completing the effective occupation of the whole Tripolitan-Tunisian frontier zone.

It is announced from Cairo that the Egyptian Government has decided, on principle, that it will not surrender the Tripolitan Sheikhs, who will be liberated on condition that they leave the country.

It is officially stated that 7,254 Jewish immigrants (2,866 men, 2,409 women, and 1,979 children) entered Palestine during 1923. Within the same period there were 3,466 Jewish emigrants from Palestine.

A letter has been sent by the Georgian Colony in Geneva to Mr. MacDonald, urging him to stipulate, in the coming treaty between Great Britain and Moscow that the Soviet troops be withdrawn from Georgia.

King Hussein has appointed a Commission, including Rashid Bey Tali, a former Premier of Transjordania, Musa Kazim Pasha el Husseini, of Jerusalem, Taufiq Bey el Bisar, and others, to visit Nejd Asir, and the Yemen to advocate the principle of Arab confederation.

Captain Noel left Euston on February 14 in charge of the film party of the Mount Everest Expedition. This included Mr. Pereira, Mr. King, Mr. Helpf (artist), and Mr. Fitzgerald. They embarked at Liverpool in the City of Simla (Ellerman Line), and will proceed via Calcutta to Darjeeling, which will be the base for the expedition.

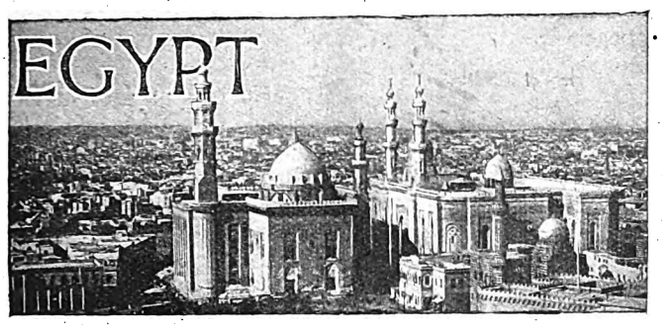
The Near and Middle East.*

From Our Own Correspondents.



Cairo, February 10.

Zaghloul's First Success.

The new Government has scored its first success in obtaining from the British Government assent to the release of practically all the prisoners sentenced by military courts. Of the total of 145 of such prisoners all are to be set free excepting any whose liberation the Egyptian Premier and the Acting High Commissioner consider would be dangerous to public security. This reservation is expected to affect only six, who were convicted as a result of the three months' conspiracy trial last summer, and who, besides having been proved to be concerned in a murder plot, were shown to be of uniformly bad character and antecedents. Of the 140 odd men who gain their freedom the best known is Abdel Rahman Bey Fahmy, formerly secretary of the Zaghloulist Wafd, who was sentenced in 1920 to imprisonment for life for distributing arms and inciting to murder. The great majority of Egyptians have never believed that Abdel Rahman Bey's conviction was just, basing this opinion on the view that witnesses for the prosecution committed perjury, and his release, which was carried out on Friday, within a few hours of Mr. Clark Kerr's informing Zaghloul Pasha of the British Government's decision, has given more general satisfaction than all the others combined. It is interesting to note the manner in which the amnesty has been received by the public. Local British opinion appears to regard the step as a matter of course, a remarkable change of view from what was generally held a year ago, when very many people thought that Zaghloul Pasha himself could never be allowed to return to this country. The Egyptian point of view, too, is interesting, and it is satisfactory to note that amid all the rejoicing over the releases, there has been no indication of any tendency to regard them as a sign of weakness on the part of the British Government, but only as a measure of justice, and especially as an indication of the British wish to promote feelings of friendship between the two peoples and to pave the way for the beginning of negotiations in an entirely amicable atmosphere.

Egypt's Foreign Relations.

It looks as though the new Minister for Foreign Affairs, Wassif Bey Ghali, who arrived from Paris last week, is going to have quite a number of interesting questions on his hands in the near future. The first concerns a party of Tripolitan nationalist agitators who were arrested at the Egyptian frontier last December and have been kept there ever since. The Italian Government, on the grounds that these men are not political, but criminal, refugees, has asked that they should be handed over to the local Italian consular authorities, but the Egyptian Government has replied to this request that it must first see the dossiers of these men in order to be satisfied that they are wanted for common law crimes. This answer was given some weeks ago, since when nothing more has been heard from the Italian side, and the local Arabic Press is growing increasingly restive at the continued detention of these men, who are described by local leading article writers as "brother Moslems, who occupy exactly the same position in Tripoli as did the present Egyptian Premier and his colleagues in this country until quite recently." How, then, asks the Press, can Zaghloul Pasha fail to give them shelter on Egyptian territory?

The Mahmal Dispute.

Another long-drawn-out difference of opinion is with the Hejaz regarding the constitution of the escort to the Mahmal and Holy Carpet. It will be remembered that last year the dispute led to the recalling to Egypt of the Mahmal, although practically all the Egyptian pilgrims carried out their original plans and went on to Mecca unescorted. Since that time there have been constant rumours of unofficial negotiations between representatives of King Hussein and the Egyptian Government, but, as the latter has just gone to the trouble of circularising its departments to the effect that Sheikh el Khateeb, the Hejaz diplomatic agent here, is not recognised, and should not be given any of the facilities usually accorded foreign diplomats, it does not look as though efforts at conciliation can have advanced very far. However, Sheikh el Khateeb, who has been with King Hussein at Amman during the past few weeks, paid a hurried visit to Cairo three or four days ago, during which he had an interview with the Prime Minister, so that there may shortly be further developments. Meanwhile, the pilgrimage season is approaching, and it is becoming a matter of urgency that some decision should be reached, for many intending pilgrims will cancel their arrangements if it should be decided not to send the Mahmal, with its escort, doctors, hospital accommodation, and general guarantee for Egyptians on the pilgrimage that their interests will be cared for.

Syrians in Egypt.

A third question now engaging the attention of the Foreign Ministry concerns the status of the thousands of Syrians in Egypt. The nationality of these people has always been a difficult question, which has been further complicated by the end of Turkish rule in Syria and the granting of the French mandate there. At the present time they are considered as local subjects, but it has always been recognised that as soon as the future of their own country was settled they would be given the chance either to opt for Egyptian nationality or to place themselves under the protection of the Power holding the mandate for Syria. In the case of the Lebanese, who form the wealthiest section of the Syrian community, and who are mostly Christians, there is a great reluctance, on religious grounds, to choosing Egyptian nationality, and an equally strong, or stronger, dislike to becoming French protected subjects. The lack of an Egyptian law of nationality makes the problem more difficult. The whole question has been raised by the appointment to Beyrout of an Egyptian Consul, who is quite likely to consider as Egyptian subjects persons whom the French authorities consider to come under their protection. It is understood that the French Government is now taking the matter up with the Egyptian Foreign Ministry.

*Under this heading appear weekly or at regular intervals communications from correspondents in Egypt, the Sudan, Roumania, Yugoslavia, Greece, Bulgaria, Albania, Turkey, Palestine, Irak and Persia.

Adventurous Journeys.

The example of Hassanein Bey in undertaking hazardous travels appears to be infectious, for it has been followed by Prince Kamel el Din's setting out from Tanta in a Citroën caterpillar car to endeavour to discover new routes in the Western Desert, and particularly to gain more exact information of the country between the Delta and Kufra oases. A good deal of secrecy has been maintained regarding the exact route to be followed, and the Prince would not say more than that, although he expects to reach the neighbourhood of Kufra, he does not intend to visit the town itself. Now it is reported that a much more ambitious journey—no less than an attempt to travel from Cairo to the Cape by motor-car—is being planned by the Duke di Spoleto, son of the Duke of Aosta, who is at present staying at Luxor. Several other experienced African explorers are said to be interested in the plans for the trip.

The Social Season.

The Duke and Duchess of Aosta arrived at Alexandria recently, and were met by their son, with whom they went on to Upper Egypt, where there is at the moment quite a gathering of notable visitors, including Lord and Lady Mount Edgcumbe, Lord and Lady Ashburton, Major and Lady Violet Astor, Lord and Lady Brownlow and Miss Cust, Lady Desborough, Count and Countess San Martino di Volpurga, Sir Ian and Lady Malcolm, Sir Maurice and Lady Fitzmaurice, Sir Arthur du Cros, Sir Wilfrid Stokes, Lady Harvey, Sir Cecil Chubb, and Dr. Strauss (son of the composer of "Salome") and Mrs. Strauss, while Sir Claude and Lady Champion de Crespigny are staying in Cairo, whither Mlle. Suzanne Lenglen is stated to be coming in the very near future. An interesting feature of the Upper Egypt season is the reappearance in large numbers of German visitors, who say that, since the institution of the Rentenmark, travelling has again become possible for them.

Bulgaria and the Adriatic Pact.

Although the official point of view regarding the recently concluded Italo-Yugoslavian pact is one of thankfulness that a source of danger to European peace has been removed, there are not wanting expressions of opinion which maintain that the signing of the pact implies danger to Bulgaria. These expressions are finding vent in newspaper articles drawing attention to the fact that Yugoslavia, in ceding Fiume to Italy, has been actuated by the desire to play a master rôle in the Balkans. This rôle cannot be realised as long as the Macedonians are in the present state of unrest and Yugoslavia is credited with the intention of making a determined effort to deal with the Macedonians at a not-distant date. Provided that Yugoslavia confine her activities to her own soil, there are not many Bulgarians who will mind what she does and how she does it. But it is felt that the recent utterances of Yugoslav statesmen, and the general tone of the Belgrade Press being considered, these activities may also touch Bulgaria. To put it briefly, Yugoslavia is suspected of envisaging a plan of action which might include the occupation of certain parts of Western Bulgaria by her troops. The fear that she might do such a thing is not widespread, as all has been quiet in Macedonia for some time past, but among certain usually well-informed quarters there is a disposition to view things in a serious light.

Recently the position of the Macedonians in Bulgaria has been brought into the limelight on account of the imposition of taxes which agents of the revolutionary organisation are stated to have carried out. The Bulgarian Government, on becoming aware of this illegal method of collecting money, sent instructions to the Prefects of Departments that the practice must at once cease, and that all persons found engaged in it must be expelled. This firm action on the part of the authorities should have the effect of arresting for the time being a form of persecution which the Jews in particular suffered. In addition to suppressing collection of taxes, it is understood that the Government have conveyed a warning to the Macedonian leaders that they must exercise the utmost care in their actions in Bulgaria. The warning points out the disastrous consequences which threaten Bulgaria in the event of any conflict arising with the Yugoslavs. It is to be hoped that this timely counsel will be listened to, because it is certain that the Yugoslavs are in no mood to be trifled with. The difficulties confronting the Bulgarian Government in the Macedonian question are, indeed, so numerous that it is very easy to criticise, but very hard to advise. The lack of armed forces; the number of Macedonian émigrés on Bulgarian territory, and the unfortunate liaison which seems to exist between certain elements in Yugoslavia and former Agrarian leaders such as Oboff and Kosta Theodoroff all contribute towards rendering the problem facing M. Zankoff well-night insoluble. The only way out would appear to be a most careful policy of honest neutrality between Macedonians and Yugoslavs. If such a policy were followed, it would at least enable Bulgaria to call on the mediatorship of the Great Powers or the League of Nations in case of necessity.

Internal Politics.

Apart from external affairs, there is much of interest at home. Yesterday the Socialist Party finished their Congress with a resolution calling on the Government, first, to give them increased representation in the Government, and, secondly, to bring in measures which will tend to reduce the cost of living and ameliorate the housing crisis. This resolution, which savours of an ultimatum, requests a reply within fifteen days, and says that in the event of a refusal, the Socialists will leave the Government. Only one portfolio—that of Railways—will be affected if the Socialists put their threat into execution, but, none the less, the defection of what had become to be known as the "Left Wing" of the Government might not be without a certain importance. It is improbable that the Democratic and Nationalist members of the Government will agree to make the concessions asked for by the Socialists, and it is very possible that they will leave the Government. The Radicals, the other party concerned with the Coalition formed last June, are due to hold their Congress at the end of this month, and it is believed that they also may take steps similar to the Socialists. If this were to happen, the Government would be a straight Democratic-Nationalist administration. Partly as a result of all the above, and partly on account of the Macedonian question, rumours have been circulated that a complete reconstruction of the Cabinet is contemplated. It is said that M. Liaptcheff, a former Minister, and a leading member of the Democratic Party, will become Prime Minister ,and that, except for General Vulkoff, the Minister for War, and Colonel Kalfoff, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, all the present Ministers will resign. It is as yet too early to discuss such an eventuality, but there is certainly a fairly strong current of opinion in favour of a Liaptcheff Cabinet.

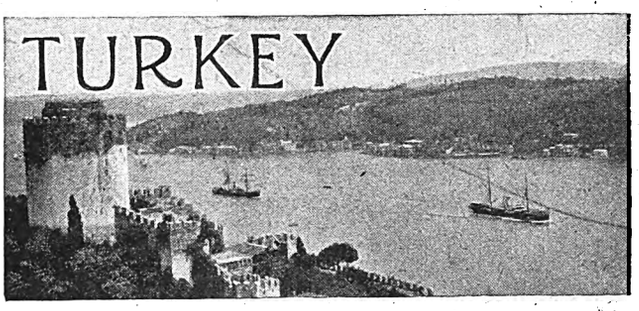
Bulgaria and the English Government.

The advent to power of Labour in England has on the whole been very well received in Bulgaria. The Baldwin Administration had never been considered hostile to Bulgaria but its very detached attitude concerning Near Eastern affairs is now expected to give place to a more interested policy. This hope has been greatly fostered by the inclusion in the Cabinet of such men as Mr. Noel Buxton and General Lord Thomson, who have often been in Bulgaria, and who have, consequently, first-hand knowledge of the various questions. The Socialist Party is especially jubilant over the change of Government, and addressed many telegrams of congratulation to Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and other Labour leaders. There is, however, one question which somewhat disturbs Bulgaria, and that is the de jure recognition of Russia by England. As readers of THE NEAR EAST will remember, in July of last year, shortly after M. Zankoff came into power, the Soviet Red Cross, which was carrying out the work of repatriation of Russian refugees, was summarily expelled on account of its Bolshevist propaganda and other activities. Neither before nor since that time has there been any form of relations between Soviet Russia and Bulgaria. This is mainly because of the friendliness existent between the Third International and the Bulgarian Communist Party—a friendliness which was looked on with much distrust by the present Government—who feared—and to a certain extent still fear—a Communist-cum-extreme-Agrarian coup d'état. But with England's and Italy's recognition of Russia, and the prospect of other European countries following suit, Bulgaria feels in a somewhat awkward position. Many economic, besides racial, ties unite her to Russia, and she would demand nothing better than to be on normal relations with a Power which was instrumental in creating her. Probably efforts will be made at an early date to smooth over some of the differences which exist, but there is no gainsaying the fact that the Communist menace still looms large in the minds of the present Government. This menace is, perhaps, not altogether shadowy, and must not be disregarded.

General News.

M. Rasko Majaroff, a former Democratic Minister, has been appointed Minister of Justice in place of M. Smiloff, who resigned last autumn.

It is believed that diplomatic relations between Turkey and Bulgaria will be resumed at an early date. M. Simeon Radeff, the Bulgarian Minister-elect, is now in Constantinople, but Turkey has not yet nominated a representative to Sofia.



Constantinople, February 12.

The Shifting Scene.

Changes of considerable importance are taking place in the Turkish political world. A new wind is blowing. Since the elections of last summer, which were so arranged as to exclude not only from office but also from the Chamber a considerable number of prominent men who were politically suspect from the narrow point of view of the People's Party, the difficulties facing the new Turkey have been more sanely realised, and the prospect of their solution for the good of the country is now seen to depend upon a much more statesmanlike attitude, both towards international relationships and internal questions, than has been shown during the past six months.

General Impressions.

No unprejudiced observer will deny that the main features of Turkey's first few months as an independent republic are, first, a clear indication that the policy of deliberate estrangement from the rest of the world is ridiculous and suicidal; secondly, a proof that, owing to the country's economic and financial situation, she needs foreign countries more than foreign countries need her, and a gradual realisation by the cooler Turkish heads that there are plenty of foreign interests ready to collaborate with the rulers of the new Turkey on equal terms so long as Turkey will stick to her bond and not mix politics up with business; thirdly, that no foreign State wants to have anything to do with her internal politico-religious affairs and that foreign Powers are rather relieved than otherwise to have to deal with a purely civil body politic; fourthly, that the present Turkish administration has sufficient authority and a sufficiently definite mandate from the articulate classes of the population to ensure its maintaining order and carrying on tant bien que mal the internal administration of the country. It has also become abundantly clear that the Government and Assembly have hitherto done nothing but talk of what they are going to do in the blessed realm of reconstruction, and now that such important preliminary matters as the form of the State, the organic law, and so on, have been settled, even the most patient and the most apathetic part of the nation considers that something practical ought to be done without delay.

The Movement of the Time.

This is no news, but what is new is the fact that apparently steps are being taken to get something practical done. The cloud is as yet on the horizon only, and is no bigger than a man's hand, but it is to be hoped that it will soon rain manna upon this hungry land. The sojourn of the President of the Republic in Smyrna may have been due originally to the state of his health, but it has also served a useful purpose in divorcing him from the party atmosphere at Angora and has given him a sight of the big world. Consciously or unconsciously, he has been gradually adopting the attitude of the non-party head of the State, which, after all, is his function. The People's Party has done the thankless spade-work, and has recently performed a good deed in testing public feeling on the subject of the Khalifate and the laicisation of the State by arraigning the principal publicist before an extraordinary tribunal and taking a toss over it. Now, therefore, is the time to swop the pilot.

Hussein Jahid Bey.

The recent visit of a party of Constantinople journalists to Mustapha Kemal at Smyrna is noteworthy, for it gave the President the opportunity of "making up" in a very marked manner to Hussein Jahid Bey, who has so recently been the object of a criminal prosecution initiated by Ismet Pasha and his Government, and who, during his trial, laid so much emphasis upon his pure republicanism and laicism. The figure of Hussein Jahid is a prominent one, and his importance lies in the fact that he is known to be in close touch with the moderate enlightened Nationalists, who, although convinced that the Turk is the salt of the earth, and republican Turkey a potential paradise, are painfully aware that it is not yet a paradise. That group of public men includes also a number of experienced and openly avowed Unionists, as well as the camouflaged Unionists who have labelled themselves as members of the People's Party, and rumour has it that a new Government is being prepared which will include such men as Midhat Shukri Bey, Ismail Jamboulat Bey, Hussein Jahid Bey, Fethi Bey, Hussein Reouf Bey, and others of that kidney. It is supposed also that a dissolution of the Assembly is in sight, but the evidence for that is very slight; it would be a good move, for the influence of the Assembly elected last summer has been fatal to both the Governments which have been in office, and there is no reason to suppose that it would show itself more tractable to a new Cabinet, however capable and broadminded it might be.

Foreign Relations.

The foreign relations of Turkey remain in the condition of comparatively uneventful state of suspended animation. They are still rather unhappy about the delay in the ratification of the treaty, and have taken a somewhat acrid tone on the subject of the French desire for special privileges for their educational institutions. The Turks affect to believe what may be true, namely, that the French are holding over their heads the threat of non-ratification unless they concede to them greater privileges than were agreed to at Lausanne. The Angora Press at once shouted the horrid word "Capitulations," and that roused a hornets' nest, and the French Acting High Commissioner has been trying to pour oil over the whole controversy. M. Maurice Pernot, for the Revue des Deux Mondes, has been asking Mustapha Kemal what he thinks of the French schools, and, incidentally, soaping him with approbation of the Turkish action in closing one of the American schools. He did not succeed, however, in persuading the great man to declare that the Turks could not possibly get on without the French schools, and would grant them any privileges they wanted. However, one does sympathise with the very capable directors of the French schools in the Orient who have done, and are doing, very fine work.

General News.

The visit of the Australian Premier for a few short hours was a noteworthy event, for H.M.S. Calypso came up to Constantinople, to take him down to Gallipoli, and exchanged salutes with the shore battery at Selimie. Mr. Bruce was the object of great courtesy on the part of the Turkish authorities—a fact which he acknowledged in an interview given to a Press representative.

The new diplomatic representative, the Hon. Ronald Charles Lindsay, arrived this morning by the Orient Express, and was greeted at the station by the personnel of the Embassy.

The first attempts have been made during the last few days to inaugurate an aerial postal service between Constantinople and Angora. A Junker machine complete with pilot has arrived from Germany, and has made two or three attempts to make the first flight. It has, however, been hampered by the weather, and on the last occasion by a defect in the motor.

Jerusalem, February 6.

High-road Murders.

After the murder of Captain Swann last June the Jaffa-Jerusalem high-road was, till a few weeks back, carefully patrolled by the British gendarmerie. This road, like the rest of Palestine during the last six months, then remained innocent of any unfortunate incident. So peaceful had things become, that the special policing of the road was discontinued. But ten days ago this peace was tragically broken by the murder of two non-commissioned officers, Walker and Dunn, belonging to the A Company of the Duke of Wellington's Regiment, now stationed in Jerusalem. Although there is a comparatively heavy traffic along the Jerusalem-Jaffa road, it runs most of the way through the most desolate regions, and by the side of rugged hills which afford ample shelter and opportunities of escape for brigands. The two soldiers were returning in a hired car from Jaffa, and soon after 4 o'clock, nearly two hours before nightfall, two miles or so after passing Bab el-Wad, mid-way between Ramleh and Jerusalem, where the road enters the higher Judæan hill country, the car was shot at and stopped. The passengers were unarmed and unable to escape and had to submit to being searched. They were robbed of something like £8. The brigands wanted more, and when one of the soldiers went towards the car to show them where other money, if they had had it, would have been, the brigands suspected some ruse, shot both men in the stomach, and made off. Cars soon passed by from both Jaffa and Jerusalem; both the men were at once taken off to hospital, but died within a few hours. The police were promptly on the tracks of the brigands, and just at nightfall succeeded in getting into touch with the brigands near Artuf. They discovered a store of food and certain clothes belonging to them, and, from the nature of these, concluded that the brigands hailed from Transjordania. In spite of their utmost efforts, the police and gendarmerie have so far failed to catch the men, and it is supposed that they are now beyond the Jordan.

The murders came as a shock to all sections of the community. It might be thought, in view of the large police, gendarmerie and military force in Palestine, compared with the limited area to be supervised, that it would be an easy matter quickly to track down the murderers. But nobody knowing the country can be surprised at the culprits getting away. The lie of the land of Judæa is all on the side of the lawless.

Hard Weather.

During the last four days Palestine has suffered the most violent wind and rain storms that it has known for years past. North of Jaffa, the road to Petach-Tikvah has been submerged and impassable; the pontoon bridge over the Auja has been swept away; in Transjordania, in the Wadi Shaib, has been a large landslide, effectually blocking the main road; the Allenby Bridge over the Jordan at Jericho is under water at both ends; and the High Commissioner and party, who had gone over to Amman last Sunday, specially invited by Hussein to join him in a huge Hejazi banquet of countless courses, found themselves held up in Transjordania, roads blocked, snow all over the mountains of Moab, and were forced to work their way back by train, by way of Deraa and Semakh. With the exception of some rocks washed down on to the rails between Artuf and Der esh-Sheikh, the Palestine railways have suffered no harm—a marked difference from the condition of things only three years ago, when any unusually heavy rainstorm washed away the railway track. A fortunate result of this hard weather is that the rainfall for this winter is already much in excess of the total for the whole of last winter, and that Jerusalem is not likely to suffer during the coming summer from the serious scarcity which prevailed during the latter end of this past summer.

Resignations.

Many resignations from the Palestine Administration are announced—officially and unofficially. Those which are arousing most interest concern Mr. H. St. J. Philby and Mr. E. T. Richmond. Mr. Philby's resignation as chief British Representative in Transjordania may be due simply to a wish to return to his own proper sphere in India; but it is supposed that his departure is more or less connected with his unsympathetic attitude to the ambitions of Hussein, who no longer styles himself mere "King of the Hejaz," but "King of the Arabs." Readers of Mr. Philby's "Heart of Arabia" will recall the terms in which the author refers to the Hejazi King and the praise he bestows on the Wahhabi leader. Furthermore, "it is said" that the main outcome of Sir Herbert Samuel's and Sir Gilbert Clayton's interview with Hussein was a strong recommendation to send a Hejazi representative to Koweit to negotiate for the fixing of the various frontiers in the Arabian Peninsula, and a firm statement to the effect that Great Britain "would recognise only such findings by the Koweit Conference which should define the frontiers as they existed prior to the War"—i.e., to nullify the Wahhabi conquests of Hasa, Asir, and the Jebel Shammar! If this (which is surely most improbable) should be true even in part, it will be the entire negation of Mr. Philby's mission to Ibn Saud (who, according to later reports, is not dead, after all), urging him, as he hoped for Great Britain's favour, to attack Ibn Rashid, Hail, and the Shammar—which he most effectively did.

Mr. Richmond's resignation is arousing considerable comment in Palestinian Arab circles. At first the Arab Press announced that he (as the only eligible person) was to succeed Mr. Philby at Amman, but it is officially announced that Mr. Richmond leaves for England in April, while the post of British Representative at Amman goes to Mr. Symes, Governor of Haifa district. Mr. Richmond is conspicuous in the local Administration as one of the few—the very few—officials with a detailed, expert, intelligent, and sympathetic acquaintance with Arabs and Arabic civilisation and ideals. He will certainly be a loss to the Administration. A certain Arab paper has cried out in alarm that in this resignation is something "unusual"; whereupon another Arab paper retorts that it is, on the contrary, most exceedingly "usual," and asks: "Where are General Bols, General Money, Captain Brunton, Messrs. Gabriel, Waters-Taylor, Stirling, and the rest of the company of Arab sympathisers? They, like Mr. Richmond, have one and all 'resigned'! Did ever an official with Jewish sympathies or Jewish blood 'resign'"?

"A BOOK TO BE READ ALOUD."

"SERVANT OF SAHIBS." By Rassul Galwan. (Cambridge: W. Heffer and Sons. 9s. net.)

This is the story, told by himself, of Rassul Galwan, a Mohammedan of Leh, the capital of Ladak, and of how from a poor widow's son he became the trusted servant and companion of sahibs travelling and exploring in Central Asia.

The story takes us as far as the beginning of his service in charge of the caravan of the American traveller called by Rassul "the poor sahib," who suggested to him that he should write an account of his adventures, and through whose help and advice it came to be written. "The poor sahib's" wife has edited the manuscript as it was sent to them chapter by chapter during fourteen years, altering Rassul's own words as little as possible and retaining all that was of most interest. She impresses on the reader that to get the most pleasure from these adventures written in "breaking English" the book must be read aloud, and certainly the graphic, strangely worded phrases gain both in quaintness and in significance if read in this way.

All the time we are shown Rassul's thoughts, his doubts, his difficulties, his opinions of the sahibs with whom he travels, his agreements and disagreements with his fellow servants. At the end we have formed a clear picture of him, and scarcely need to be told that the "poor sahib" said, "Rassul's manners are perfect; the most polished gentleman could do no more than equal them"; and "He is a very good person and a father to his men."

There is an introduction by Sir Francis Younghusband, one of the sahibs with whom he travelled, in which he points out how clearly are shown in this book Rassul's true love of adventure, the fidelity with which he served, and his "touching faith in God."

The longest part of the story is that which gives an account of his dangerous and exciting journey into Thibet with Mr. Littlefield. His feelings as he got near to his home and his young wife again are described with his usual effective simplicity. "Now come near Leh. At that time pleased, how shall I write? Every one traveller know this happy; after long journey, reaching at home.

"Sometime felled in sorrow and said myself, 'Maybe my wife be die. Maybe mother be die. These people not give me that bad news. Cannot believe till see with own eyes.'" However, all was well. "My wife when see me laughed and said, 'Welcome!' I said, 'By help of God and with your right prayer, I came well.'"

The last chapter, "Testing the Sahibs," is the most amusing in the book, and is interesting for the descriptions of the long discussions amongst the Indian servants on the quality and standing of their master, the American traveller to whom Rassul afterwards became so devoted. Rassul is torn between the evidence of his eyes that his sahib is a "very poor sahib," and also eccentric. "After long desert everyone wanted village; he travelling from desert to desert," and his instinct which tells him that he is with "a big man," and that he will "get good luck with him." We leave Rassul at the point where his instinct proves to be right.

This little drama is well worth reading, and the reader who has enjoyed the incident of "the very poor chick" and "her several childs" will find great enjoyment in reading aloud—or to himself, a little at a time—Rassul's story from the beginning, "What I Did in my Young Time," and will be grateful to the "poor sahib" that Rassul can say "by his kindly I learning this my style, which now I written as a book."

TRANSJORDANIA AND PALESTINE.

Under the auspices of the Near and Middle East Association a meeting was held, by the courtesy of Dowager Lady Boyle, on February 15, at 64, Queen's Gate, the subjects of exposition being Transjordania and Palestine. Mr. Leland Buxton was in the chair, and the principal speakers were Lord Raglan and Mr. C. R. Ashbee.

In his paper on Transjordania, Lord Raglan put forward the case that there was neither economic nor geographical reason for the existence of such a State as Transjordania. He briefly described the nature and inhabitants of the various parts of the country, dwelling on the beauties of the archæology of such a place as Jerash, which was better than Amman and equal to Baalbek. At the moment Transjordania was chiefly remarkable for being the home of all sorts of bandits—from Irak, Palestine, and Syria: it was also the only home of the Pan-Arab movement. Its ruler, the Emir Abdullah, exercised his sway only through the aid of British arms, but for which his country would now be in the direst anarchy. The native police were a hopeless lot, and those under Colonel Peake not much better. As an instance of the government of the country, Lord Raglan quoted the recent statement of a Jerusalem Moslem paper to the effect that of the £120,000 revenue of Transjordania, £90,000 was spent on the Emir Abdullah's household expenses. He asserted, in short, that the principles of the Hashimite family were wholly guided by monetary considerations.

Mr. Ashbee claimed to deal with Palestine from the unofficial point of view. After five years' experience of the Administration of Palestine, he satisfied himself that the present British policy was wrong. When he went to Palestine in 1918 he was, if anything, prejudiced in favour of Zionism, but of its present working out he disapproved. The Government had completely failed in the two things that any government in Palestine ought chiefly to consider: the regeneration of the peasantry, and the recognition of archæological development. The Balfour Declaration had sprung, he thought, out of the essential Presbyterianism of the British and American races, in ignorance of the major claims of the Moslem population of Palestine. The present uncertain policy of the Administration could not endure: it was unintelligent, and could not possibly be really impartial. What, therefore, must be done? The Balfour Declaration should be maintained, but the preferential clause of the Mandate must go. Incidentally, Mr. Ashbee affirmed that the Pan-Islamic movement was the eastern counterpart of the spirit of nationality in the West, but it was more spiritual and democratic.

A paper, written on the present situation in Palestine by Colonel Bramley, was then read, claiming that the Administration of Palestine should be commanded either by an Arab, or, if so competent a person from the prevailing race in Palestine could not be found, by a purely British official.

It was Mr. Ashbee's last point that Mr. Felix Valyi developed in the subsequent discussion. He asserted that the Islamic world felt that its progress was impeded principally by the Protestant Churches and the Orthodox Church, and that it viewed with alarm the present rapprochement between the Anglican Church and the Greek and Russian Churches.

The fact that the Balfour Declaration was so warmly supported by an English Roman Catholic and a High Churchman, which Mr. Leland Buxton asked Mr. Ashbee to explain, was overcome by the remark that these two men upheld the Declaration as politicians, not as religious beings!

Lord Headley spoke on behalf of the Hashimite family, by whose kindness he had recently been privileged to visit Mecca. He was loud in his praises of King Hussein and of his four sons, Ali, Abdullah, Faisal, and Zeid (who might one day be King of Syria). But Lord Raglan remained unconvinced.

THE SITUATION IN INDIA.

At the moment the political situation in India is complex, and perhaps awkward, but it is by no means destitute of promise. It is not our present purpose to discuss the eddies on the surface of the stream, which change in feature almost from day to day. The clash of policies and personalities is doubtless full of interest, but of much greater importance are the main currents of feeling and opinion, and the clash of ideas and aspirations. During the last century the distinctive British idea of a fair chance for all has been making headway slowly, at first almost imperceptibly, in a country where the people had for centuries been habituated to the ideas of privilege and ascendancy, displayed in their most uncompromising form. The hope for a better India lies in a gradual and orderly advance towards realisation of the new idea, and the great merit of the existing Constitution is that, for the first time in Indian history, it has opened the wide field of politics to such an advance. Its working was, however, crippled at the outset by the abstention, in part deliberate and in part the result of deplorable accidents, of brains and talents which in other circumstances could have rendered valuable aid. Now, after three years in the wilderness, important sections of the abstainers, having realised the initial mistake, are standing at the door, or, rather, just inside it, and, in fact, though not in form, are asking to be accepted upon terms. In such a position the natural British attitude is to avoid recrimination, and make things as easy as possible for the people who have changed their minds. We take it that this is the attitude adopted by the spokesmen of the Government of India in the debate at Delhi which is in leisurely progress as we write, and it is one of which we cordially approve, subject only to the proviso that, in making it easy for a few people to come in, nothing must be done which may operate to perpetuate the disabilities of other and more numerous classes with equal or greater claims to be considered.

In a political centre such as Delhi this proviso is unfortunately by no means unnecessary. With a very narrow franchise, and, as yet, little organic connection between members and their constituencies, the tendency is to form a closed circle, and to regard Delhi as India, though perhaps not one-hundredth part of India is there effectively represented. Judging, as we are entitled to do, from the writings, speeches, and resolutions of the last three years, the thing that interests Indian politicians least of all is the extension of the franchise. They seek new powers for themselves, but are in no hurry to increase the number of their masters. They are eager to take over the despotic authority of Parliament; they will tell the masses exactly what they must and what they must not do, what they shall eat and drink and wear, how they shall spend their leisure hours; but of any genuine attempt to study the wishes and the feelings of the people we can as yet discern no trace. Nor can much be expected in this way from the Government itself. We recall, indeed, that a high official mocked the tariff policy of the moment on the ground that, if the people understood it, they would have nothing to do with it, but the matter ended with a barren gibe, and, speaking generally, the members of the Executive are too much absorbed in the current business of the moment to pay much attention to any classes except those by whose action current business may be accelerated or impeded. In such an environment, where the majority may have self-government in the brain, but retain despotism in the blood, it is easy to conceive that a convenient working arrangement within the legislature might operate to exclude still further all influences from outside, and might stereotype the existing oligarchical monopoly of political power to such an extent that it would be impregnable except by physical force. The privileged classes would control the administration, the masses would once again become their plaything, and the old, bad India would for a time be reproduced.

Such a result would obviously contravene the decision reached by the British sovereigns of India, but a more important practical objection is that the Indian masses would not stand it for long, and that the force needed for its destruction would be forthcoming in forms which, if once mobilised, the wisest statesmanship might fail to moderate or control. The British leaven has been working outside the charmed circle as well as within it, and classes which have been oppressed for uncounted centuries are now becoming restive under the oppression of their fellow-countrymen. The change is notorious in India, though it is the fashion in some circles to disregard it. Evidence of its existence may be found everywhere, but we must content ourselves with citing as a single example the proceedings before Lord Lee's Commission. These representatives of the privileged classes have testified abundantly to their dislike of the British executive officer, and have pressed for his speedy elimination. The spokesmen of some of the oppressed classes, on the other hand, have insisted that the British officer is essential for their regeneration. They do not yet feel strong enough to fight their own battles, and, distrusting their countrymen, they appeal to England for help. The sentiment is, of course, not new, but its public expression is a portent which no experienced politician would ignore. Hitherto, however, only a few of the classes outside the Constitution have found a voice. They are not yet prepared to make trouble for the Government, but, in view of the obvious dangers of the situation, it is the clear duty of statesmanship to keep ahead, and not to delay until popular demands are backed by popular passion. That duty must be discharged mainly by the statesmen of this country. Parliament has enfranchised a minute proportion of the population of India; but it remains trustee for the vast majority, and in the actual situation it must take measures to ensure that their interests do not suffer through any arrangements which may be worked out in Delhi. To our mind the guiding principle must be the correlation of franchise and powers. We desire to see the Indian people given increased powers of self-government as rapidly as possible, but we do not desire to see the powers of the privileged classes further increased; on the contrary, we would have them progressively curtailed through successive extensions of the franchise, until the oppressed classes can hold their own, as we believe they will soon be able to do. Undoubtedly, it is desirable to secure the co-operation of those Indians who have stood aloof from the Constitution: it is more important by far to bring in the vast numbers who have been left outside.

THE ITALO-YUGOSLAV TREATY.

By J. S. BARNES.

Ever since he came into power, Signor Mussolini has sought and worked for an understanding with Yugoslavia. He has been lucky in having MM. Pashitch and Nintchitch with whom to negotiate, for both these statesmen have also had the vision to realise the importance of coming to an arrangement with Italy. Apart from the running sore occasioned by the controversy over Fiume, and from the obvious advantages of an economic understanding between two States whose products so well complement each other, each party required to be secured in their rear: Italy, in order to give herself freedom to bring her influence to bear on the Mediterranean problems which chiefly interest her, and, as a Great Power, to have a weightier voice in the question of Reparations and Inter-Allied debts; Yugoslavia, in order to strengthen her hands in dealing with Balkan and Central European problems of vital interest to her, and to free herself from being little better than a pawn to be played according to the wishes of France in pursuance of the latter's Continental policy, which in certain respects might conflict with her interests.

The present Treaty of Amity, together with the settlement of the Fiume question and the preparation of a commercial treaty, bars and bolts the back door of both States against any hostile action which might otherwise have been taken by one of them should the other, in the pursuit of a policy of equilibrium in their respective sea and continental spheres, find herself in difficulties. It is greatly to be hoped that the settlement will prove permanent, and that it will result in abolishing war for ever from the Adriatic. The Treaty assures the benevolent neutrality of either party in the event of one of them being attacked by a third Power, and it insures common action in the event of a general European crisis.

It is true that most Italians, including Signor Mussolini himself, have regarded the abandonment of Italy's claims on Dalmatia with regret. Dalmatia was secured to Italy by treaty as a condition of entry into the War on the side of the Allies. Her claims to Dalmatia were largely based on strategical considerations, and if these are satisfied through the present treaty by the alternative method of agreeing with one's adversary, little further cause for regret need be entertained. What Italians felt particularly deeply was that Dalmatia was surrendered without securing Fiume. Fiume desired to be Italian, and if Italy desired Fiume partly for economic reasons, it was mainly on account of Fiume's self-determination, and because Fiume was comprised within her natural land frontier, that Italy desired to annex the port.

But Italy was denied Fiume at the Paris Conference, should she insist on the integral application of the Treaty of London. She was thus placed in a painful dilemma—and finally she chose to renounce Dalmatia rather than to commit what Italians would have felt was a betrayal of their Fiuman fellow-countrymen. Nevertheless, this act of renunciation has hitherto failed to give her Fiume. She appeared to have given up something for nothing. Nor was the something which she had given up of purely strategical value. Dalmatia is mainly Croatian in character; but it was felt that the Croatian element, which consists almost entirely of illiterate peasants, should be weighted not numerically but qualitatively against the majority of the cultured minority who were Italian-speaking and Italian by tradition. Moreover, Dalmatia is more closely connected with Italy by sea than she is connected with Yugoslavia by land, because of the great chain of the Dinaric Alps, which cuts her off from any great commercial or cultural intercourse with the Continent. The giving up of Dalmatia represented, therefore, a real and deeply felt sacrifice for Italians, and if Fiume was not to be Italy's in compensation, it was a sacrifice wasted—a sacrifice which rankled all the more when it was remembered that the Croatian troops in the Austrian Army fought against Italy more bitterly up to the very last moment of the War than any other body of her opponents.

But good sense has triumphed at last on both sides, and the bitterness of the past years has now been succeeded by a genuine sense of serene goodwill and of sincere relief. Signor Mussolini is also credited with the desire to make this Treaty of Amity with Yugoslavia a stepping-stone to an understanding with England. This fact brings into the picture Italy's attitude towards Greece, England's protégé. A few words on this point will, accordingly, not be out of place.

Italy's commercial rivalry with Greece in the Levant is the principal cause of the lack of goodwill existing between the two countries. But most Italians are prepared to let this rivalry take care of itself in as chivalrous a manner as business permits. It is the political future of Greece which preoccupies Italy most. She does not wish to see Greece the cat's-paw of England. She understands that England is properly concerned to maintain safely her communications with the East throughout the Mediterranean. She sees no reason to quarrel with England in this respect. She believes England has no territorial ambitions in the Mediterranean, and, this being so, she earnestly desires to be the friend of England—a friend on which England may rely for help at all times, and especially in war-time, to maintain freedom of sea communications. She desires, accordingly, that England should disinterest herself in Greece, and for the following reason, which has a direct bearing on her relations with Yugoslavia. The Italian Premier has a very piercing eye to realities. He is not led to neglect the real forces which determine events by any Utopian aspirations, and one thing he sees very clearly indeed: he sees that Greece's hold on Salonika and Western Thrace is precarious. Geography, which is a consideration that escapes most statesmen, is very much appreciated by Signor Mussolini; and geography binds Salonika and Western Thrace so intimately with Serbia and Bulgaria that he believes it is more than likely—unless the miracle of a Balkan Confederation can be brought about—that the day will come when Yugoslavia and Bulgaria, acting in concert, will march to the Ægean. He may be wrong; but if that day does come, it becomes Italy's interest to see that the conflict is not widened beyond the three countries immediately concerned. This is peculiarly Italy's interest, because then Yugoslavia and Bulgaria cannot fail to obtain what they desire, with the result that the Adriatic would become an outlet of secondary importance to Yugoslavia, thereby giving Italy the opportunity of strengthening her position there by agreement with Yugoslavia. It would also enable Italy to obtain concessions from Yugoslavia in respect of a readjustment of Albania's frontiers, and so enable her to pursue the Fascist leader's policy vis-à-vis Albania, which is to bind the two countries together in the most intimate manner possible, and, by removing causes of dissension between Yugoslavia and Albania, to bring Albania into his scheme of a Pax Adriatica.

One of the first results of the present treaty will be an improvement in the relations between Yugoslavia and Bulgaria. That is the preliminary condition of any events foreshadowed in the last paragraph. Thinking Italians are preoccupied with what they deem must inevitably follow, and would consequently like to make the whole position clear with England on the basis of a definite understanding to the mutual advantage of both countries covering all Mediterranean problems. These include a field of questions beyond the scope either of this article or of THE NEAR EAST. The above implications underlying the Yugoslav Treaty will, however, form the kernel of the discussions which at a favourable moment will no doubt be entered upon between the Governments of Signor Mussolini and Mr. Ramsay MacDonald.

Greece.

The Saturday Review of February 9 is scarcely hopeful of the outlook in Greece, for of the present position it says :—

> So many of the Greeks are, as before, politicians rather than patriots, and it may be that Venizelos made a mistake in departing from his first intention when he went to Athens—which was to stand aloof from politics and act solely as a mediator. As Prime Minister he could scarcely be impartial politically. A colleague of his has formed a new Cabinet, but is hardly likely to succeed where so great a Greek as Venizelos has failed.

The Birmingham Post of February 13 is equally gloomy of any peaceful result : it says, concerning M. Kaphandaris's draft resolution on the constitutional question :—

> This deliberate prejudging of the issues on which a plebiscite is shortly to be taken is the very thing against which M. Venizelos fought. As he knew, the conditions under which this Assembly was elected render very dubious its character as a representative body. Moreover, it was, in his view, desirable that the plebiscite should be as free and untrammelled as Greek political circumstances allow. For these reasons M. Venizelos sought to avoid any expression of opinion by the Assembly. M. Cafandaris, reversing the policy, runs grave risks of making much worse a situation already dangerous. Practically, he serves notice on the voters at the coming plebiscite that the Executive—and the Legislature behind it—are committed to a Republic. It is all very well to explain that "only a spontaneous expression of the national will would suffice to invest any decision on these fundamental issues with incontestable authority." In practice everybody, in Greece and out, will conclude that the expression of the national will is to be anything but "spontaneous." It will be expected that the plebiscite will be conducted in such a way as to ensure that the "national will" coincides with that of the Executive and of the Assembly. Whether M. Cafandaris is going his own way or is being pushed on by the people who sought to push M. Venizelos is not very important. Voluntarily or no, he has taken a course which will make the plebiscite itself a source of political disturbance; and will ensure that its result will be accepted by none of the Royalists. He is plunging headlong into the precise dangers M. Venizelos strove so zealously to avoid.

The Affair at Luxor.

The Evening Standard of February 14 offers no opinion on the last acts of Mr. Howard Carter in closing the tomb of Tutankhamen, but it says :—

> What should have been a great chapter in the advance of archæological science has been carried on throughout in an atmosphere of irrelevant sensationalism and recriminations. Unless Tutankhamen was an unusually warlike king, his corpse has caused more disturbances and quarrels than ever the living man. Now, the only justification for opening this or any other tomb is that science may be thereby advanced. Human feeling would not attempt, nor would public opinion permit, the action except in the cause of knowledge. But if we are to feel this justification, the dignity of science must be preserved, as in this instance it signally has not been. We hope that matters will not rest where they are, and that some worthy solution may be reached which will allow of the work being continued. But if the Pharaoh remains in his sarcophagus, his tomb will have become a monument to something besides his own glories, to something on which mankind will look with less complacency.

The Daily Express concentrates attention on the fate of Tutankhamen :—

> If the Egyptian Government assumes control, every civilised nation whose interest has been aroused will look to the Frenchman in charge of the Egyptian Antiquities Service to carry on the investigations in the brilliant manner in which they have been maintained by British and American archæologists. The history of Egyptology from the time of Belzoni onwards is marred by wrangles and the lust of the treasure hunter. Irreparable damage has been done by hasty decisions. Every archæologist in the world is looking to the young Government of Egypt in the hope that if it assumes responsibility for the unveiling of Tutankhamen it will fulfil brilliantly a task that would test the scientific ability of any nation.

NOTES AND NEWS.

Tuesday Morning.

Trade Under Difficulties.

No one familiar with the conditions after Waterloo could doubt that the years immediately following the Great War would constitute a most trying period for commerce. What has happened has been more or less in accord with expectations. Inflation, with its accompanying rise in prices, was bound to bring about a spell of Labour disturbances, and each year since 1918 has had its quota of strikes, with 1919 and 1920 easily first in this respect. Down to the beginning of the present year the tendency has been for first a gradual and then a rapid but always a continuous decrease in Labour troubles. Now, apparently, the pendulum has begun to swing in the upward direction, and with the dock strike following the railway strike, and with other crises hovering in the distance, it would seem that business enterprise is likely to be faced with a most difficult year.

Consequences of Present Situation.

Why these things should have come upon us now, just at a time when trade was beginning to revive, is a matter on which opinions differ. It is true that prices have again begun to rise, though not to any great extent, this being due, in my opinion, to the revival of demand from Continental countries, a factor which I pointed out long ago would play its part in due course. This, of itself, might not have been sufficient to create the present situation, but it is also at least possible that the concatenation of events that have resulted in a Labour Government have played their part owing to the belief that under the present Administration it would be possible for the workers readily to obtain what they desire. But while that is a disputable point, and it may be that strikes would have occurred whatever Government was in power, it needs no emphasis that their continuance will have no other result than to prolong and render more serious the trade depression from which we have been suffering so long. It is profoundly to be hoped that the workers will have the good sense to realise this aspect, for it is only by a united effort that this country can hope to regain its position in the markets of the world, and thus render possible the maintenance of its present population.

The Strike and the Exhibition.

A not unimportant aspect of the present strike is the effect its continuation for any length of time must have on the forthcoming British Empire Exhibition. Only those who have been to Wembley can have any idea of the gigantic nature of the work involved in preparing for the Exhibition. The whole undertaking has been planned on unprecedented lines. There has been literally nothing like it before, and if it is to be ready at the appointed date (which is now announced to be St. George's Day, April 23), it is essential that there should be no extraneous obstacles to the task of preparation. Unfortunately there has been one already in the shape of the railway strike, but the effect of that, while far from negligible, would merely mean an extra effort to ensure that the buildings and their contents were ready by the day. The dock strike is a more serious matter, and if it should be protracted I fail to see how the postponement of the opening of the Exhibition can be avoided. It is greatly to be deplored that a period of industrial unrest should coincide with this undertaking, on which such hopes have been fixed, for even if the Exhibition itself is not affected, it is at least probable that some would-be visitors from overseas may alter their plans through lack of appreciation of the fact that strikes, if they take place, produce the minimum amount of effect on our existence.

Sudan Trade Expansion.

The figures for the trade of the Sudan for the eleven months ended November 30 indicate very plainly that when the statistics for the whole year are available they will compare most favourably with those of 1922. In the period mentioned the imports amounted in value to £E3,862,480, as compared with £E,3,593,664, or an increase of £E268,816, public imports accounting for £E2,488,572 of the total. The value of the exports for the same period amounted to £E2,345,503, as against £E1,811,746, and with re-exports and transport trade, both comparatively small items, the total volume of trade came to £E6,362,657, compared with £E5,655,333, an increase of £E707,324. The Sudan, as will be seen from the figures quoted, still has a considerable adverse trade balance, but there has been an improvement in this respect as compared with 1922, and that fact, combined with the rise in the volume of trade, shows how rapidly the country is being developed, and it is very obvious that it will not be many years before the staple commodity of the Sudan—cotton—gives the country a favourable trade balance.

The British Trade Corporation.

The report of the British Trade Corporation for the year ended December 31 last, which has just been issued, can only be regarded as eminently satisfactory in view of the conditions that prevailed during the past year. There was a profit of £74,380, out of which £25,000 has been transferred to the reserve against shareholding interests in subsidiary companies, etc., making that fund £325,000. Out of the balance of £49,380 it is proposed to pay the fixed dividend of 6 per cent. per annum on the "A" shares, leaving £10,480 to be carried forward.

Steaua Romana (British).

At the meeting of the Steaua Romana (British)—a report of which will be found elsewhere in these columns—Sir Charles Greenway, the chairman, was able to give a most encouraging review of the position of the company. For the year ended June 30 last the production of the Steaua Romana Company (Bucharest) amounted to 230,843 tons, as compared with 223,939 tons for the previous twelve months, and during that period the company drilled 11,572 metres, as against 12,706 metres. The company recently struck a "gusher" on the Runcu field, which had an initial production of 800 tons per day, but which, owing to sanding up, has since fallen off to 50 tons per day. Sir Charles pointed out that the company has two more wells in the neighbourhood of this gusher which are on the point of reaching the oil sand, and will, it is anticipated, also prove to be good producers. Dealing with the Steaua Romana (British), Sir Charles pointed out that it is a holding company, depending for its prosperity on the Roumanian company, the reorganisation of which has now been completed. "This company," he added, "is functioning as one of the largest self-contained oil companies in Europe. It has a yearly production of some 220,000 tons, which it is hoped will be considerably augmented in the near future; it has a refinery capacity of three or four times that amount; it has its own distributing organisation and transport tankers." Sir Charles expressed the view that the time is not far distant when it will be possible to declare annual distributions to the shareholders, apart altogether from any improvement that may in the meantime take place in the value of the leu. As regards the latter question, he remarked that economic conditions in Roumania are undoubtedly improving, and Roumanian bankers express a good deal of confidence in an early appreciation in the gold value of their currency.

Sofia, February 4.

The Sugar Dispute.

During January a violent conflict arose between the Government and local sugar manufacturers. To follow this dispute it is necessary to remember that for the last twenty years a monopoly in this commodity has to all intents and purposes existed in Bulgaria. Import taxes on sugar have been very high, and the five local factories have been enabled to make big profits and largely increase their production. But in 1923, partly owing to a disease of beetroot and partly owing to the disorganised state of railway communications, brought about by the June and September disturbances, production was considerably below the normal. This entailed a rise in price, which was much resented by the public. A newspaper campaign was started against the local manufacturers, and the Government was urged to reduce the taxes on imported sugar. This called forth energetic protests from France, Czecho-Slovakia, and Belgium, whose nationals hold the controlling interest in the five sugar factories. A verbal diplomatic démarche was made, in which it was pointed out that foreign capital would suffer if sugar was not protected. But the Government was not able to resist the popular outcry, with the consequence that a Bill providing for greatly reduced taxes on foreign sugar was brought before the Sobranje and duly passed. Now everyone is hoping for cheaper sugar, and, as the price heretofore ruling was equivalent to about sevenpence a pound, there is no reason why these hopes should not be realised.

The Question of Imports.

The sugar dispute, which is virtually one of Protection versus Free Trade, has aroused a certain amount of interest in the import tariff. The financial policy of the present Government has been greatly to raise the tariffs on imported goods, and some of the articles which cannot be described as being luxuries now suffer from an almost totally prohibitive tax. This results in the "killing of the goose that lays the golden eggs," but it is argued by the Government that it helps to stabilise the exchange at the rate of 138 leva to the dollar, thus helping trade in other directions. On the whole, this is true, but it is to be hoped that the present measures are only temporary, as later on an economic system should be devised which will permit of the tax on imported goods rendering a good return to the State.

A Financial Mission.

MM. Liaptcheff and Buroff, former Ministers, are proceeding to Paris and London at the end of this week, having been charged by the Government with an economic and financial mission connected with pre-War Bulgarian loans in France and England. As both these gentlemen have a long and practical experience in financial matters, it is felt that an excellent choice has been made.

A scheme is on foot in Bulgaria to build a new waterworks system (says an American Consular report). The sources of supply will probably be the lakes of the Rilo Mountains, about fifty miles south of the city.

The Director of Public Works, Russian Buildings, Jerusalem, desires to receive regularly from manufacturers catalogues, price lists, and other advertising literature concerning all kinds of plant, tools, instruments, and materials requisite for general public works, including road building, water and electricity supply, building construction, drainage, etc., state the Crown Agents for the Colonies.

STOCK AND SHARE MARKETS.

AN UNSETTLED TONE.

Business on Restricted Scale.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday Morning.

The markets have fluctuated a good deal since I last wrote, and until the last few days conditions might well have been described as promising, for the improved political outlook at home and the growing prospects of better trade abroad were beginning to be reflected in quite an unusual outburst of market activity. There has been more doing in the markets than for years past, but the combination of the dock strike and renewed weakness in the foreign exchanges has naturally had the effect of putting an end to business on an extended scale, and buoyancy has been replaced by unsettled markets. I do not think the check need be regarded seriously, and before very long I expect to see the markets going ahead again. But, of course, this view would have to be modified should the strike prove prolonged.

The most interesting feature of the recent activity has been its widespread nature, Industrials and certain of the Mining groups being particularly good. This is invariably a sign of the improvement of general conditions, and no doubt when things begin to move again the tendency will spread even to the dullest markets, such as Rubbers, a revival in which is long overdue, and the statistics in regard to which suggest that it will now not be long in coming.

The gilt-edged market has made a very firm showing, and the advances in this section yesterday exceeded the declines. Foreign stocks were rather variable, with French stocks exceptionally weak on the exchange fluctuations. War Loan Fives were down to 21¼ x.d., while the Four per Cents. were 17¾. Home Rails were dull on the strike, such movements as took place being in the downward direction. The Industrial market was unsettled, but business, as is usual in adverse conditions, has been extremely restricted. Textiles were a rather strong spot, but Iron, Steel, and Engineering descriptions have displayed a sagging tendency. Tobacco shares are somewhat lower, while Shipping securities are about the same. Movements in Egyptians have been of no great moment. Bank shares have been fairly steady. Oils have been rather dull, but Anglo-Persian Ord. have been very firm, and at 3 1-16 are ⅛ up.

The construction of a generating station will shortly be undertaken by the Aden Port Trust (says an American Consular report). The plans involve an expenditure of about 600,000 rupees. It is planned that work will commence on the project during this year, and expected that the streets of Aden will be well lighted and the houses equipped with lights and fans by 1926.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

The Question of a Control Scheme.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended February 16 states :—

There have been one or two notable developments in the cotton trade during the past week. The committee called together by the Lord Mayor of Manchester some months ago had, first of all, to admit the impossibility of arranging a scheme of control to cover the whole industry, and now they report failure of the revised scheme to cover the American section only; it is understood that the latter is due to the opposition of manufacturers, who, not unnaturally, do not care for the prospect of dearer yarn. The decision, however, does not necessarily mean that all efforts to arrange a control scheme have been abandoned. A large number of spinners of American cotton are still pressing for some scheme which will apply to themselves only. and in the meantime they propose to take a ballot on the question of resumption of organised short time working.

A dispute which has arisen at one of the spinning mills, and which is in itself a very small matter, threatens to cause considerable trouble. The employers, on the one hand, and the operatives' trade union on the other, have taken up firm attitudes. There is still, however, time for the matter to be arranged, and it is believed that good sense will prevail.

A further trade dispute which may cause great inconvenience in the cotton trade is that with regard to dockers' wages, and if the strike is actually carried into effect and is prolonged, the export section will gradually be forced to a standstill.

Yarn.—There is no improvement to record in the state of affairs. Prices during the week have fallen probably more than proportionately to the reduction in the price of the raw material, and at the present time there is no doubt that sellers are in the hands of buyers. Shipments during January amounted to 10,991,500 lb., against 11,136,500 lb. in December and 12,814,700 lb. in January last year.

Cloth.—It is said in certain lines there has been rather more business during the past week, but, generally speaking, reports are unfavourable. China is operating a little more freely, and, of course, a certain amount of business is always being transacted for India, but these two principal outlets remain as a whole very unsatisfactory. Shipments of cloth in January were 353,965,900 square yards, against 323,100,000 square yards in December and 399,988,200 square yards in January last year.

Raw Cotton.—A break has occurred, and the general feeling now is that the worst has been experienced in the matter of high prices. Last Saturday and Monday saw small increases, but quotations have fallen every day since yesterday by as much as 75 points. No doubt the reduced consumption is beginning to make its effects felt.

LONDON PRODUCE REPORT.

Coffee Still Rising.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday Morning.

Sugar.—Home refined has continued in good request. Tate's cubes have risen to 67s. 9d., an advance of 2s. 3d., London granulated at 64s. 1½d. has gained 1s. 6d., while Lyle's granulated at 64s. 4½d. is also 1s. 6d. up. Foreign descriptions have been firm. White Java has been done at 61s. 1½d., at which it shows a rise of 10½d., while Czech granulated is 1s. 1½d. up at 62s. 7½d. Futures have been steady. Quotations are:—March, 34s. 3d.; May, 33s. 3d.; August, 30s. 4½d.; November, 24s. 9d.

Coffee.—The rise in this commodity has continued, though the rate of advance has slackened. East Indian at 155s. is 5s. up, Costa Rica has also gained 5s. at 145s., Nairobi shows a similar advance at 125s., while Santos is 6s. up at 84s.

Oilseeds.—Linseed has been rather variable, with La Plata 3d. down at 18s. 4½d., while Indian is 3d. up at 22s. 9d. Rapeseed has been weak, Toria being 6d. down at 19s. 10½d., while real bold Ferozepore is unchanged at 19s. 9d. Cottonseed has been dull. Indian at 11s. 1½d. is 1½d. down, Egyptian black has shed 3d. at 13s. 7½d., while Sakellarides remains at 12s. 9d.

Seed Oils.—Linseed oil has been firm, and at 51s. 6d. is 6d. up. Rape oil has been steady, with crude at 48s. and technical refined at 51s. Cotton oil has been quiet. Refined common edible is unchanged at 49s. 6d., Bombay crude remains at 43s., Egyptian crude is unaltered at 45s. 3d., technical is the same at 46s., while deodorised remains at 51s. 6d.

Oilcakes.—The market has hardened. Linseed cake at 280s. is 5s. up, coconut cake has gained 5s. at 195s., while cottonseed cake is also 5s. up at 175s.

SMYRNA FRUIT MARKET.

Messrs. C. J. Giraud and Co., of Smyrna, report as follows for the week ended February 2:—

The arrivals on the Smyrna market since the opening of the season are estimated at 36,400 tons, and the sales are put at 35,000 tons. Prices are unchanged, but the market is quiet. The absence of business does not appear to influence dealers' pretensions. Stocks admittedly are small, but concessions in prices would appear necessary to bring us on to a parity with the values that consuming markets are prepared to pay.

CONDITION OF EGYPTIAN CROPS.

The bulletin of the Egyptian Ministry of Agriculture gives the following particulars regarding crop conditions in January:—

Wheat.—Atmospheric conditions were, on the whole, favourable for early sown crops, but late areas have slightly suffered from cold weather and winds. Manuring and watering, where artesian wells are available, continued during the month under review. The progress of the crop so far is normal. Ears are forming in the early sown fields.

Barley.—Weather was, on the whole, favourable to early sowings; the condition of the crop is normal. A few early sown areas are flowering.

Flax.—Growth in early sown fields is progressing satisfactorily, but as some areas were sown late, the plants in these have not reached the height they normally ought to have attained. Careless weeding of some fields also accounts for somewhat unfavourable growth. Flowering has started in a few early sown plantations.

Bersim.—Growth is, on the whole, normal, although weather has been rather cold and windy. Slight attacks of "Hamoul" (dodder) were reported from Giza, Girga, and Fayoum, causing unimportant damage. The first cutting is approaching completion and the second one has begun. Ploughing in the temporary bersim is taking place.

Helba.—The early crop is forming pods satisfactorily.

Lentils.—The growth is normal and the main crop is in flower.

Onion.—Growth of the crop is satisfactory.

Beans.—Growth is, on the whole, normal, although the last few days have been rather windy, causing some shedding of flowers. Slight attacks of broom-rape, bean blight, and rust are reported from different localities, causing practically no damage. Flowering is general everywhere.

Sugar Cane.—The crop has matured and harvesting is general. Normal attacks of stem-borer and mealy-bug are reported from different localities. Sugar factories started working during the month. Yield prospects are about average.

H.M. Consul-General at Smyrna points out that most of the commercial literature available at the Consulate-General was destroyed in the fire, and that it is rather difficult in the circumstances for local enquiries as to the names of United Kingdom manufacturers and exporters to be adequately dealt with. Although the prospects offering for the sale of British products in Smyrna at the present time are not very great, the Consulate-General would, nevertheless, be glad to receive up-to-date catalogues and general commercial literature from British firms, and it is suggested that those desiring to have their catalogues or other literature displayed in the Consulate-General should forward them, postage fully paid, to H.M. Consul-General, British Consulate-General, Smyrna.

SUDAN PRODUCE.

The current issue of the monthly report of the Central Economic Board of the Sudan Government gives the following particulars :—

Gum.

The exports of gum during December were as follows (in tons), the value being given in brackets :—Via Port Sudan : bleached 22 (£E1,466); hashab, 1,340 (£E56,272); talh, 37 (£E736); via frontier passes : talh, 1 (£E13).

Kordofan Province.—5,156 kantars of gum were sold in El Obeid market during the month of December, as against 4,403 kantars during the same month last year. The average price was £E1.095 m/ms. per kantar. The arrivals at El Obeid from Nahud were 1,188 kantars as against 3.014 kantars last year. The amount sold at Nahud during the month was 1,759 kantars, as against 6,639 kantars last year : the average price being £E0.990 m/ms. per kantar. 6,360 kantars were sold at Um Ruaba at an average price of £E1.105 m/ms. the kantar, as against 1,960 kantars last year. At Rahad 6,985 kantars were sold at prices ranging from £E1.150 m/ms. to £E0.950 m/ms. as against 7,111 kantars during the corresponding month last year.

Kassala Province.—656 kantars of hashab gum were exported in December, mostly from Gedaref. The price was 975 m/ms. at the beginning of the month, but dropped to 81 m/ms. at the end of December, while talh fetched from 310 m/ms. to 322 m/ms. per kantar. The price of hashab gum at Mafaza was 911 m/ms.

Cotton.

Berber Province.—Mikeilab pumping station report for December :—Area under cotton, 230.4 feddans. Cotton is looking very well; the early sown is in full picking. The late sown is also satisfactory, but will not open for some time. Up to December 86 kantars of 315 rottles (unginned) have been brought into store. Gendettu pumping station report for December.—Area under cotton, 662.2 feddans. Cotton weighed in to date amounts to 1,652 kantars of 315 rottles (unginned). This compares very favourably with last season, when the total crop was 1,657 kantars from 618 feddans. The bulk of the crop is still yielding freely, and final results should be satisfactory.

Dongolla Province.—Gureir pumping station report for December.—Area under cotton, 323 feddans. Cotton is still very promising; bolls are all now opening well, and picking has been fairly general of all the earlier sown cotton. Quantity weighed into store at end of month, 45 kantars of 315 rottles (unginned). Nuri pumping station report for December.—Area under cotton, 711 feddans. Cotton is looking fair. Some is slow in opening.

Kassala Province.—November : Rain-grown cotton in the southern districts is looking well, and a little has already come into Gedaref market, where it fetched from 90 to 135 piastres per kantar of 100 rottles (unginned). Gash.—It is probable that the cotton yield will be less than was at first anticipated. On the other hand, cotton sown early looks extremely well, and some has begun to flower. December : Rain-grown cotton, 452 kantars of 100 rottles (unginned) of rain-grown cotton have already come into Gedaref and Mafaza and have fetched such good prices that a great demand for seed is anticipated in 1924. The price rose to P.T. 184 per kantar of 100 rottles of seed cotton at Mafaza. (b) Gash.—Prospects at Hadaliya have, on the whole, improved owing to heavy dew, which has given the later sown cotton a chance. On the other hand, some of the early sown cotton is showing a tendency to dry, probably owing to insufficient watering, and thrips have appeared in patches. Picking has started, and the market here will open about the end of January. At Mekali on the new area the cotton is promising, notwithstanding some recent damage from tree-locusts and gazelle. Picking will start about the end of January, and the market will open in February. Cotton on the old shaiotes is mostly looking well. There is some good cotton at Madert near the Eritrean boundary. Work is progressing well on the Magauda canal, and there is every indication that water will shortly be struck in the permanent well at Hadaliya, which is down to 110 feet.

Red Sea Province.—December. At Khor Arbaat an experiment in cotton growing is being made this season. The delta contains approximately 7,400 feddans, and is situated about 10 miles north of Port Sudan. The whole of this land is not suitable for cotton growing. At present some 1,300 feddans have been sown with cotton, and the greater part of it is looking very promising. At Tokar rain has fallen all over the Delta. The cotton prospects are bright. The cotton is looking fresh and good, and the quality is reported again this year to be excellent. The cotton market will open on or about March 1.

INDIA'S TRADE IN DECEMBER.

The trade returns of British India for the month of December, 1923, showed, as compared with the preceding month, an increase in the value of exports, accompanied by decreases in imports and re-exports. The imports of private merchandise totalled Rs.15,42 lakhs, and showed a decrease of Rs.5,67 lakhs. The value of the exports of Indian produce and manufactures rose to Rs.29,98 lakhs from Rs.26,41 lakhs in the preceding month, while re-exports decreased by Rs.27 lakhs to Rs.95 lakhs.

Measured by the statistics of merchandise, treasure, council bills, enfaced rupee paper, etc., the visible balance of trade was in favour of India to the extent of Rs.12,27 lakhs in December, as compared with Rs.1,53 lakhs in November and of Rs.5,90 lakhs a year ago. During the nine months ending December there was a favourable balance amounting to Rs.40,50 lakhs, as against Rs.20,63 lakhs in the corresponding period of the preceding year.

The share of the United Kingdom in imports fell from 64.9 per cent. in December, 1922, to 53.3 per cent. in December, 1923, and in exports from 30.6 to 29 per cent. The shares of Germany, Japan, and the United States in December, 1923, were respectively 5, 5, and 6 per cent. under imports and 5, 9, and 10 per cent. under exports.

The tonnage of vessels entered into British India and cleared outwards with cargoes from and to foreign countries and British Possessions during December amounted respectively to 527,000 and 647,000, as against 604,000 and 627,000 in November and 534,000 and 639,000 a year ago. The tonnage entered into and cleared from British India during the nine months April to December was 4,967,000 and 5,790,000 respectively, as compared with 4,914,000 and 5,447,000 in the same period last year.

Company Meeting.

STEAUA ROMANA (BRITISH).

The general meeting of Steaua Romana (British), Ltd., was held on January 14 at Winchester House, E.C. Sir Charles Greenway, Bart. (chairman of the company), presided.

The Secretary (Mr. B. C. Macnamara) having read the notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors,

The Chairman, in his speech in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, said that economic conditions in Roumania were undoubtedly improving, and as soon as the uneconomic post-war restrictions were fully removed, the great natural wealth of the country should cause a speedy improvement in exchange. The conditions of the oil industry had been considerably improved by the action of the Roumanian Government during 1923, firstly by the increasing of internal prices of oil products, and, later by the removal of the major portion of the restrictions on commerce in oil products. The nationalisation of the subsoil was a measure of epoch-making importance, and although the chairman was not acquainted with the terms of the new Mining Laws, he had reason to believe that they would be beneficial to the oil industry.

Dealing with the Steaua Romana Company of Bucharest, he said that for the year ended December 31, 1922, a dividend of 50 per cent. had been paid. In June, 1923, the company increased its capital by 50 per cent., and the Steaua Romana (British), Limited, took up its proportionate quota amounting to 38,672 shares issued at 550 lei each, against a market value at the time of issue of 3,825 lei, and the present value of 5.700 lei. The elctric power station constructed by the company in conjunction with the local power company was working well to the great advantage of the company, and supplying current to other operating companies. A line was being laid to Bucharest to supply the capital, which would enable the station to work at full load with a consequent decrease in overhead charges. An important gas well had been struck, part of the production of which was utilised in running the power station, which was within three miles of the well and the workshops and refinery at Campina, the balance being sold.

A "gusher" had recently been struck at Runcu with excellent initial results, but owing to the sanding up its production had, as reported in the Press, since fallen off to fifty tons per day. Two other wells, however, in the same field were just on the point of reaching oil, from which good results were expected. Drilling contracts on the lands of the Credit Minier and I.R.D.P. companies leased by the Government were being successfully carried out, and a good production from royalties was expected. Production for the period July 1, 1922, to June 30, 1923, was 230,843 tons, against 223,939 for the previous year; and drilling 11,572 metres against 12,706.

Dealing with the position of the Steaua Romana (British), Limited, he said that the augmented oil prices in Roumania would increase the yield upon the company's holding of Steaua Romana shares. As regards the advance to the Roumanian group, comprising the six leading Roumanian banks, and the interest thereon, this had been repayable at the end of 1924 under the terms of the agreement signed in June, 1922. As a result, however, of the representations made by the Roumanian group, and the desire to assist their evident intention of meeting their obligations at the earliest possible moment, and to maintain the friendly co-operation between the British, French, and Roumanian groups, a further arrangement had been entered into between the three groups as follows: The interest accrued to June 30, 1923, was to be capitalised; the new principal sum was to bear interest thereafter at 6 per cent. instead of 8 per cent.; 5 per cent. of this interest was now to be paid half-yearly in cash in sterling and the remaining 1 per cent. added to the principal sum; unless the earnings on the Roumanian group's Steaua Romana shares exceeded the equivalent of 5 per cent., when the cash payment of interest was to be increased by the amount of such excess up to 6 per cent.; any further excess being utilised to amortise the principal sum, repayment of which was to be put off until the end of 1926. The addition to the principal sum was to be secured by securities and/or lei deposited by the Roumanian group under the terms of the old agreement. A first half-yearly payment of interest to December 31, 1923, under the new arrangement, had been received amounting to over £27,000.

The Chairman said that it was disappointing that no dividends had been hitherto declared, but he anticipated that the company was now not far off the stage when this would be possible. The assets of the company, consisting of Steaua Romana shares, securities held in respect of the advance to the Roumanian group, cash on hand, and Treasury Bills, represented, after deducting all liabilities, between 19s. and 20s. per share; so that, although the leu had depreciated by nearly 80 per cent., the gold value of the company's investment was practically the same as when originally made.

The report was carried unanimously.

TENDERS INVITED.

Tenders are invited for the following contracts, and must be made by the dates mentioned.

(Particulars of tenders marked D.O.T. are to be obtained from the Department of Overseas Trade, 35, Old Queen Street, S.W.)

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS.

HAMADAN, January 12.

The import market is very quiet, owing to the mildness of the winter and the shortage of silver bars. The export companies are busy owing to the increased demand from America for Persian carpets and rugs.

BASRAH, January 19.

Business in sugar has been insignificant. Two vessels have left this port with a full cargo of grain (wheat and barley) of about 10,000 tons. The stock existing here comprises 7,000 tons of wheat, 5,000 of barley and 520 of maize. Shipments of dates for Egypt continue.

SHARP ADVANCE IN RAW FUR PRICES.

The report of the London Fur Trade Association (Inc.) on the January raw fur skin sales states:—

We have to report a record attendance at these sales. On the opening day of the main series the saleroom was so crowded that even standing room was difficult to obtain, although there was a noticeable scarcity of French buyers present, due, no doubt, to the adverse exchange. Had there been the usual number of representatives from France the saleroom would have been too small. No doubt France is waiting until the March sales, hoping that the monetary position will improve by that time. Fur traders in that country appear to be short of goods and are willing buyers; had they been competing to any appreciable extent we should have had to record even bigger advances.

The acute depression which overhung the market in October gradually disappeared, and the goods which were then unsaleable began to be absorbed. Trade in America, Germany, and Austria improved materially, and an active demand set in, which culminated in very keen competition and heavily advancing prices in almost every class of fur skin. The staple goods, such as skunk and musquash, which declined so considerably in October, were readily disposed of at prices which approximate to the values at last spring sales.

The Germans were the biggest buyers, but Austria and America also took very large quantities. The whole of the stocks on hand, as well as the new catch, were readily absorbed; so that the market is now practically cleared. There is no reason to expect any fall in March, particularly in view of the fact that the French demand is still unsatisfied; the English trade has not yet operated to any appreciable extent, and as the new catch of American furs is reported to be very much below the average, a very large supply for the spring sales is not expected.

PALESTINE MARKET FOR MOTORS.

Following a comparatively rapid increase in the last two years, the use of automobiles in Palestine appears to have become stabilised, and the prospects for expansion of the market are not particularly bright (says an American Consular report). As late as 1921 the number of motor vehicles in the country did not exceed 500, but the registration now is placed at approximately 1,000, of which the majority are of American manufacture. Most of the cars are used in tourist travel, in which the good military roads are an important factor. The market now has as many motor vehicles as the yearly tourist traffic will require, it is believed, and the chief demand in the immediate future will be for replacements.

THE MANUFACTURE OF SALT IN INDIA.

By SIR RICHARD M. DANE, K.C.I.E.*

Salt manufacture, especially in Upper India, has been so influenced by the policy of the East India Company and the Government of India that any account of manufacture must largely be a description of that policy. Salt has been manufactured on the sea coasts of Southern India from time immemorial. Bengal, Bihar, Assam, and Orissa have also been supplied with boiled salt made locally from sea-brine. In the interior of the country, even in the south, transportation was so costly and difficult that locally made salt, however impure, was used wherever possible. Agra and Oudh used salt made from saline earth and from brine wells in Bhartpur State and Gurgaon district, and also some salt from Sambhar Lake. Punjab was supplied partly from Rajputana and partly with rock salt and earth salt. Sind used earth salt, and some spontaneously formed salt. Central India and Central Provinces used salt from Rajputana and Bombay. In Rajputana salt was abundant.

The East India Company made the production and sale of salt in Bengal a Government monopoly in 1782. Salt was purchased from the manufacturers by agents and sold by the Government to the public. Monopoly was profitable, and the supply of a certain quantity of salt was assured. The salt was bad, but was probably as good as any previously produced. The company's monopoly in Bengal was abolished in 1863; and since 1873-74, when stocks were exhausted, Bengal, Bihar and Assam have been supplied with foreign salt. For many years English salt was nearly 80 per cent. of the total imports.

In 1801-34, in territory now the property of the United Provinces Company, an attempt was made to tax locally made and imported salt as an item on the Inland Customs Tariff. The attempt was partially successful on the Rajputana border, but the collection of high duty on earth-salt locally made was impossible. In 1834 the policy was adopted of taxing only salt, sugar, cotton, and shawls at Customs, the line being fixed near the boundary of British territory. Inland Customs Houses were abolished and goods paid duty when crossing the line. Taxation of all other articles was remitted. Manufacture of earth-salt within the line was prohibited, and in time was forcibly suppressed. After annexation, the line was carried round Punjab, and subsequently round Central Provinces and Berar.

This policy was financially successful, but in the territory encircled salt was dear, and the line obstructed trade and traffic. The Government accordingly embarked on the policy of the control of salt at its sources. Sambhar Lake was leased from Jodhpur and Jaipur States in 1869-70, and other minor sources in 1878; agreements were made with other States, which provided for the passage of duty-paid salt; taxation of salt in Bombay and Madras, which up to this time had been much lighter than in Bengal, was raised; and, when the taxation throughout India was equalised, the Customs line was abolished in 1878-79. The construction of the Rajputana-Malwa Railway, which linked Sambhar, in 1875, with Delhi and Agra, made this policy possible. When this policy was adopted, salt works in Bhartpur and Gurgaon were the principal sources of supply in the United Provinces. Rajputana was unwilling to lease Bhartpur works, and closed them, as they could not compete with Sambhar. Gurgaon works also were soon destroyed by competition with Sambhar.

* A lecture delivered before the Indian Section of the Royal Society of Arts on February 15.

Of five minor sources leased by Jodhpur and Jaipur only Didwana and Pachbhadra could be profitably worked, and the others were closed. As a set-off against this destruction of salt sources, manufacture on the shore of Lesser Runn of Cutch was concentrated in 1875 at the Government works at Kharaghoda; and Government works were opened in Sind, in 1878, near Karachi, when suppression of earth-salt manufacture was undertaken. By adoption of this policy the Government assumed responsibility for the supply of salt to Upper India. The supply was restricted to eight sources: three were unimportant, and the remaining five were under direct Government control. Sambhar Lake, with its normal annual outturn until recently of about 150,000 tons, was the most important source.

As the population increased, so the consumption increased. A supply which was sufficient for a population of 250 millions was insufficient for a population of 300 millions. The imports of foreign salt in 1903-05 were about 450,000 tons annually. Now they are about 550,000 tons. The annual production in 1898-1903 averaged 980,000 tons; now it is 1,450,000.

The production of sea-salt in Bombay and Madras is the most important salt industry in India: sea-salt being about 60 per cent. of the total output. Madras supplies mainly local demand only. Bombay is a large exporter to other provinces and native states. Administrative methods adopted in the two Presidencies were contrasted and differences in quality of salt examined. Open salt sources in Upper India were described. Until 1902 the supply of salt in Upper India was adequate, but there was no margin. In that year I raised the question of the ability of Sambhar to meet the continually increasing demands upon it. The advisability of amalgamating Bombay and Northern India as supply departments for Upper India was suggested about the same time. Investigation of the resources of Sambhar made by Sir T. Holland was reassuring. The amalgamation question was referred to a Committee composed of representatives of Bombay, Madras and Bengal, and myself. Partial amalgamation of Salt and Customs at Bombay, since made more complete, blocked the formation of a strong specialised Salt Department. The majority of the Committee also adhered to the view taken in 1889 and held that consumers outside the Presidency were not likely to suffer if salt works remained under Bombay, and the Government of India decided not to proceed further in the matter. The majority of the Committee and the Government of India favoured the amalgamation of the local Sind Department with that of Northern India, but this project also was dropped owing to strong opposition from Bombay. For Bombay sea-salt the Committee considered additional works necessary, as the margin between the annual outturn and the normal demand was too narrow. The Bombay Government at first agreed; but the question remained under consideration for seven years, and was finally shelved in 1912, after an unusually good manufacturing season the Bombay Government committing themselves to the opinion that the existing works were capable of producing in ordinary years 400,000 tons, and that the interests of the public might safely be left in the hands of the manufacturers.

After the outbreak of war the supply of English salt to Bengal was cut off owing to shipping and freight difficulties. Aden and Port Said salt took its place to some extent, but in the four years 1916-17 to 1919-20 there was a shortage of imports of about 690,000 tons. The situation was further complicated by the partial failure of manufacture at Sambhar in 1916-17. Bombay and Madras were unable to assist. For the four years ending 1919-20 the outturn at Kharaghoda was affected by bad seasons and scarcity of labour, and sea-salt failed badly. In the three years from 1915-16 to 1917-18 the annual outturn averaged 329,000 tons only. In 1918-19 production at Sambhar reached 426,000 tons; and the outturn of sea-salt at Madras and Bombay was also very large. After the conclusion of peace, imports also recovered. But during the period of scarcity there was wild speculation, and Government sources could not supply the salt which was applied for.

Energetic measures were adopted by the Bombay Government in 1917-18 to increase output both of Kharaghoda and sea-salt, but the question of how the Government can best discharge the serious responsibility it has assumed requires careful consideration. From "India in 1923," by Professor Rushbrook Williams, it appears that the policy of the Government of India is to double approximately the output of the Punjab mines and Sambhar. As regards the Punjab mines, the policy is unquestionably right. As to Sambhar there is some doubt. The Lake is only leased; it will not be fair to Darbars to do anything which may permanently injure it. Apparently brine is deteriorating, though not at present rapidly, Possibilities of Sind as a future source of supply should be investigated before Sambhar is overworked.

In the course of the past year Czecho-Slovakia exported textiles to the value of 2,745 million crowns (close upon 19 million pounds sterling).

The traffic receipts of the South Indian Railway Company for the week ended January 19 amounted to Rs.8,63,369, making the total from April 1 Rs.4,06,06,677.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Quiet, but Steady.

The Alexandria Commercial Company, in their report for the week ended February 8, state :—

Since our last report the futures market has been quiet but steady. The American markets, the last few weeks, have not shown any particular tendency. Ups and downs have alternated, with practically no change on balance, March prices averaging round 33½c. In Liverpool and Alexandria the markets have moved on the same lines : prices have remained firm, but no appreciable changes are shown. The demand from abroad continues rather small, although early in the week there were signs of improvement.

The figures of the daily Egyptian spot sales in Liverpool have been heavy this week; we understand that apart from the Lancashire spinners, the Continent has, of late, had recourse to that market for its requirements. Liverpool is the cheapest market at the moment, and naturally attracts a large part of the business going : however, the sales there indicate a certain amount of activity in the textile trade. At the first February tender 3,250 krs. dockets were issued. Ashmouni has been slightly easier during the week, especially for February, which closed to-day at parity with April, whereas some days ago it was worth $½ more. We attribute this easiness of the near position to speculative liquidation and to a realisation of the fact that the difference between Sakel and Ashmouni was too narrow. There is nothing fresh to report regarding local politics; the Parliament, it is said, will meet at the end of next month. Arrivals from up-country, although on the decrease, still keep fairly large, and the quantity of cotton received now exceeds 5½ million kantars; in view of the good export figures, however, stocks in Alexandria now stand at 1,811,833 krs., against 1,840,639 krs. a week ago, and 2,221,221 krs. a year ago. The quantity of cotton held up country is appreciably smaller than it was a year ago, and the work in the ginning factories is very often interrupted owing to shortage of supplies. In Upper Egypt the season is almost at an end. We maintain our opinion that the position is too strong to allow of any severe drop in prices in the near future; on the other hand, however, unless the demand from abroad expands, a much higher level of prices should not be looked for. The week's arrivals amount to 106,118 krs., against exports 134,924 krs.; the stock stands at 1,811,833 krs. Spot : Minet-el-Bassal has been slightly more active this week, and spinners have shown a little more interest in cotton. Sales amount to about 14.250 B/s, of which we estimate 9.300 B/s Sakel, 4.700 B/s Uppers, 150 B/s Brown and Pilion, and 100 B/s White. Arrivals are about the same as last week and exports rather less. The stock shows a slight decrease.

Sakellarides : The medium and lower qualities have absorbed most of the demand, and only a small inquiry has been met for the higher grades. Prices of spot against contracts are generally without much change.

Uppers : Business has been done in all grades, and a steady demand has appeared for the lower qualities. Prices of spot against contracts are a little easier for high grades, steady, without much change, for medium styles, and firm and rather dearer for low qualities.

Brown and Pilion : A fair business has been done. As in Uppers, the better grades are inclined to ease, medium are steady, and lower styles inclined to harden.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended February 13 :—

Egyptian Spot.—Another good week's business has been witnessed in spot Egyptian, but prices, after fluctuating within narrow limits, have shown a slightly easier tendency, which is most marked in Sakellaridis. Uppers and brown cotton have again been brought nearer to the Sakellaridis quotation by another farthing a pound. Whilst quite a fair general business has taken place, the bulk of the sales reported have been for export to Russia, and, in a lesser degree, to the Continent, the relative cheapness of Liverpool as compared with the Alexandria market having attracted more business from Continental sources than has been seen for some considerable time. In all, about 2,700 bales appear to have been purchased for export, the greater part of which have been good, to strict good, Sakellaridis at about 150 on March contracts. Although the Sakellaridis inquiry still continues to centre round cotton from 50 to 100 "on," there has undoubtedly been a tendency on the part of spinners to take more interest in the better qualities. This is probably due to the fact that so much of the F.G.F. cotton this season is proving very unsatisfactory as regards staple. To-day, F.G.F. Sakellaridis of good staple is commanding from 80 to 100 points "on" contracts, and there does not appear to be any great amount of it on offer. This does not necessarily mean that it is not to be found, as there is a growing inclination on the part of holders of good staple lots either to raise their basis to what, at the moment, is a prohibitive figure, or temporarily to withhold their cotton altogether from the market. For this state of affairs, the oft-repeated warnings from Egypt that next season's crop is to contain only a comparatively small amount of Sakellaridis are largely responsible. The lower qualities, from fair to St. good fair, continue to be pressed for sale at from 25 "off" to 50 "on" contracts.

In uppers, a good business has taken place, but mostly in the "pass to 50 off" cotton, at which price F.G.F. can be purchased in fair quantities. A considerable gulf, which is hardly shown in the official quotations, appears to exist between this quality and the "good" varieties, but the market here is still very irregular for good to fine, and it is hard to fix on any ruling basis—probably about "100 on" would be somewhere near the average. Slightly more interest has been shown in brown cotton, but the high prices asked for the good lots are choking business in this direction. Sudan cotton, which last week furnished such a large proportion of the sales, has been practically neglected. C.i.f. business has ruled very quiet, although any reasonable offer made from Alexandria usually finds a buyer. On the whole, however, quotations from Egypt are right out of the market. Manchester reports of late have been rather cheerless, but the Egyptian section of the trade still appears to be doing fairly well, and will not be involved, of course, in the short-time discussions at present proceeding. Estimated sales, 7,000 bales Egyptians and 50 bales Sudan.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Danger Signals.

From the Yugoslav point of view it must be regarded as unfortunate that at the very moment when the British Government's official candidate for the Nobel Peace Prize is strengthening his claims to that emolument by asking questions in the House of Commons on the subject of the pacification of Montenegro, the Yugoslav Government should endeavour to make the world's hair stand on end by terror-stricken recitals of the terrible things that Bulgaria, with an army of 20,000 men, is going to do in Europe. Now, the British public may be sentimentally inclined, but it is not altogether a fool. It has had ample experience of pacifists, as well as of Serbians in their capacity of brothers-in-arms of unflinching gallantry; and nothing will ever convince the British public that the Yugoslav nation, which would quite cheerfully take up single-handed a challenge thrown down by a Great Power such as Italy, will ever have anything to fear, or even will believe for a moment that it has anything to fear, from an attenuated Bulgaria. Consequently, when, at one and the same moment, the Yugoslav Minister in Paris and the Belgrade Press begin to cry to the heavens in unison about Bulgaria's "threatening designs against Southern Serbia," public opinion in Great Britain is not impressed in the way in which, apparently, it is desired in Yugoslavia to impress it. The British public refuses to regard the Yugoslav people as the cowards and weaklings that at their face value these broadcast fears represent them to be. On the other hand, it has a shrewd knowledge of the world at large and some acquaintance with the Balkans, and it is not foolish enough to imagine that these stupid reports, launched in such a naïve fashion, are without a very definite purpose, which it is high time, in the interests of Yugoslavia herself, should be laid bare and publicly scotched.

Yugoslavia and Bulgaria.

There is always the difficulty, in discussing Balkan differences, that criticism of one country is supposed to be prompted solely by excessive zeal for another. In the present instance there is no reason to suppose that Great Britain has any special cause to welcome Bulgarian attempts at disturbing the peace of Europe, or that, if the existence of such attempts could be substantiated, she would hesitate, in common parlance, to "jump upon" Bulgaria diplomatically. What she is asked to believe is that Bulgaria, knowing full well that if she makes a hostile move she will have to cope with two or three States, each from two to three times her size, is deliberately proposing to commit national suicide, with no tangible advantage in prospect. In the circumstances, it may well be supposed that a British Government will require more proof of Bulgaria's designs than the contradictory statements of the Belgrade Press or their echo in Paris. On the other hand, it will find it a most suspicious element in the situation that the Serbian Press is basing on its own unsupported allegations a demand for military action against a relatively defenceless Bulgaria. Great Britain has no objection in hitting swiftly and forcibly when the need is established; but she is not a bully, and she dislikes bullying in other countries, particularly on the part of those who have been honourably associated with her in real warfare. Moreover, she will be encouraged in asking Yugoslavia to pause and to submit the Yugoslav case to the friendly consideration of the Allies by the fact that there appears to be a difference of opinion in Yugoslavia itself as to the justice of the Government's attitude towards Bulgaria. If it were a fact that the Bulgarians are attempting a suicidal attack on Yugoslavia, no one would interfere to save them from the consequences of their folly. It is a different matter, however, if one political party in Yugoslavia is seeking to bolster up its position by embarking on what it imagines will be a popular course. We hope, therefore, that Yugoslavia will not be carried away by chauvinism, to her lasting prejudice in the eyes of Europe.

Trouble-seeking in Greece.

If Greece is bent on having a republic, it is to be hoped that the trouble created by the proposal will not prove an earnest of the difficulties awaiting the country after the change from a monarchy has been made. M. Venizelos is taking advantage of his freedom from office to devote some consideration to the subject of a Greek republic, to which, it has to be inferred, he gave his approval with undue haste. With the examples of Russia and Turkey before us, it is now seen that there are various kinds of republics, as there are of monarchies, and M. Venizelos is anxious to settle betimes the kind that will, he hopes, suit Greece best. He prefers the French to the American model, as he does not wish to see a Greek President possessed of unlimited power, nor, indeed, the leader of a party. At the same time M. Venizelos has launched on the Republicans an attack that they consider comes with ill grace from one who has declared himself a republican. Somewhat late in the day he appears to have realised that his fellow-countrymen possess certain qualities that are calculated to invalidate the success of a Greek republic. It is curious that such a shrewd statesman should have failed to notice that the only attempt that has ever been made by any Greek republican, himself included, to justify a constitutional change in Greece has been based on the excessive personal hatred characteristic of Greek politics, which is in itself a negation of the republican spirit. Every Greek is liable not only to be denounced as, but also firmly to be believed to be, by his political opponents an out-and-out traitor. The reason may not be apparent to others, but allowance is rarely made in Greek or Balkan politics for honest differences of opinion. As a rule the King is above such strife; but once in a century, as we have seen, political passions may blaze forth with such intensity that even the Throne is involved—with disastrous results to the people. Certainly no President of a Greek republic can expect to be immune from this national weakness, and it requires little imagination to foresee the state of a country in which possibly more than half the population will be conscientiously, if wrongly, convinced that the chief representative is intriguing against his country's interests. The change to a republic, it will be noted, is being recommended at the very moment when political passions have reached their zenith.

The Luxor Squabble.

The Law Courts, which batten on bad tempers, have temporarily claimed Tutankhamen's tomb for their own. Mr. Howard Carter has taken legal proceedings against the Egyptian Government to establish his case for a mandate over the tomb and a free hand in regard to the measures necessary for conserving the objects found in it. The case is likely to last the whole of this week. In the meantime, the tomb had been padlocked by Mr. Carter against the Egyptian authorities, and was under the police guard of the latter against Mr. Carter. A warning had been issued by Mr. Carter against the risk of allowing the heavy lid of the sarcophagus to remain for any length of time suspended by ropes, and the Egyptian authorities had asked him for the keys of the tomb to allow the lid to be lowered pending further developments. Mr. Carter refused to hand over the keys, on the strength of the pending legal proceedings, and the Egyptian authorities, very properly, it may be held, in view of the advertised risk to the suspended lid, decided to break open the doors and gates that Mr. Carter had locked. This was done last Friday, and the lid has been lowered on the sarcophagus. Now that pettiness and temper have had their fling of publicity, it is to be hoped that reasonableness and common sense will take control of the situation. Mr. Carter is obviously the right man to carry through to the final stages all the work connected with the discovery of the tomb. The Egyptian Government has very clear rights over the tomb and its contents, and archæology, even when spelt with a capital letter, is not in the least interested whether the wives and families of eminent archæologists visit the tomb this week or a month later, but is concerned that Mr. Carter and the Egyptian Department of Antiquities should get on with the work expeditiously and, if possible, amicably.

The Dodecanese and Jubaland.

Some resentment appears to have been caused in Italy by the suggestion of the British Government's spokesman in the House of Commons that the gratification of Italian aspirations in regard to Jubaland would have to be dependent on a settlement of the ultimate status of the Dodecanese. No doubt, on further investigation, it will be found that there would be nothing exceptional in Great Britain's action, if she maintained this attitude. The proposed transfer to Italy of British territory in Africa is based on the Pact of London of 1915, when Italy was promised territorial concessions in Africa as part of the bargain for her espousal of the Allied cause. In 1920 she agreed that the Jubaland question should be linked with that of the Dodecanese and the general settlement of outstanding questions in the Near East. Subsequent events may have invalidated the latter arrangement, but in the meantime Italian demands have shown a tendency to expand, and it is not unnatural that Great Britain should wish to see the spirit of the original agreement revived, which was that all outstanding problems in the Near East should be adjusted on an equitable basis. Italy does not seek to justify her retention of the Dodecanese islands, but holds that the question is one affecting Greece and herself alone. This is, strictly speaking, the case; but the attitude taken up so far by the British Government hardly amounts to a grievance as far as Italy is concerned.

Indian Politics.

The division which followed the constitutional debate in the Legislative Assembly at Delhi presented the features which had been generally expected—that is to say, the new bloc voted in full strength, while the apparent size of the minority was, as so often happens in India, reduced by the considerable proportion of absentees. To judge by the reports which have been cabled, the debate was more important than the division, for several speakers insisted on unpalatable facts, and we take it that facts are what the new Assembly chiefly needs if it is ever to settle down to useful work. From this point of view one of the most noteworthy items was Captain Hira Singh's bluff reminder that in an independent India the martial classes would have the last word, as has usually been the case in the past. He was, of course, mocked by the men of the pen, but perhaps they will be more impressed by the news, which has since come to hand, of something like a pitched battle in the Nabha State, not so very far from the place where they were sitting. As to the result of the Assembly's action, it would be unprofitable for us to speculate, seeing that Lord Olivier's postponed statement will have been made before these lines appear in print.

The Indian Law Courts.

The latest news regarding the inquiry into the notorious defects of the Indian courts of law strikes us as rather depressing, suggesting as it does that the proceedings will be more or less in the nature of a pleasant family party of Bench and Bar, with the curtains drawn and the public outside the railings in the cold. The essence of the matter is that, as merchants in particular know so well, delay and cost have combined to produce something like a denial of justice. The responsibility for the evil is shared between the judges, their ministerial staff, and the lawyers who practise before them, and we question whether the public will have any particular confidence in the inquiry as it has now been defined. We should have preferred to see a layman in the chair, somebody, let us say, of Inchcape calibre, bringing a fresh and powerful intellect to bear on practices and conventions which have become natural to the men reared among them, but, failing that arrangement, the case was surely one for bringing in a jurist from some other country, one where suits are heard promptly, and where the decrees of the courts are the end of the business, not, as in India, the beginning of the real trouble.

Indian Appeals in England.

Anyone who wants to know how Indian legal machinery really works can get a good idea of the subject from the reports of appeals heard before the Judicial Committee. It is reasonable to assume that these important cases are handled at least as efficiently as the mass of Indian litigation, yet scarcely a week passes without the appearance of some scathing denunciation of delay, neglect, or inefficiency on the part of some, or all, the people engaged in handling them in India. Whether these denunciations produce the slightest practical effect in India is exceedingly doubtful, but their continuance year after year proves at least the magnitude of the evil against which they are directed. Seeing that more than half of the Committee's work normally comes from India, it appears to us that it ought to be possible for one Bench to sit for part of the year at Delhi, or some other central place, where it could show by example the standard of efficiency it expects from others, and could deal with particular cases of inefficiency at short range. To sit in Whitehall and fulminate against Calcutta or Lahore is a method of procedure which recalls Mark Twain's plan of fighting with brickbats at three-quarters of a mile.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

The Government.

The more closely our Labour Government comes to grips with realities the more it sees the impossibility of doing things that "are not done." The gradual perception of this fact has, during the past week, been most amusingly illustrated. First we had the extraordinary spectacle of the Under-Secretary of State for Air laying down the principle that the best defence against enemy bombs was the possession of a good cause, and then the hurried admission by a superior member of the Cabinet that the egregious Mr. Leach was not sober when he swore. This disclaiming of the Under-Secretary's words was rather a pity from the Conservatives' point of view, for they had arranged to defeat the Government on this question, and, in fact, were only prevented from doing so by the kind and discreet intervention of the Speaker, who saw that the Government really had not such an impossible case as Mr. Leach had made out for them. Without doubt, the Government will be very much more careful when the subject comes up next month for fuller discussion.

Then we had the affecting sight of the Government's avoiding defeat by the support of the Conservative vote. Some Liberal, endowed with rather greater stupidity than usual, proposed the defeat of the Government because they had sanctioned the carrying-on of the construction of five new cruisers. Such naval imperialism had angered the lofty Liberals, and hot and strong they poured out invective on the Government. But all to no avail, for the Conservatives rallied to the Government, as doubtless was fully known beforehand, and the Government retains its place, with the unexpected addition of much kudos.

In such manœuvring as this it is impossible not to see the crafty hand of the Scot. Mr. MacDonald probably knows to an inch how far he may go in a certain direction and yet keep the support of a sufficient number of members. Of course, he does not care a button which part of the House they come from. But it must be a very wearing business.

A New Government.

Consequent upon the Government's being saved in turn by the Speaker and by the Conservatives, there has been a good deal of talk about the impending dissolution of the Labour Government. Much of it is doubtless ignorant—possibly both the Opposition parties feel that they are exercising more power now than if they were actually in office, and do not very much mind things as they are—but Colonel Jackson himself has recently warned us that a change may be nearer than is generally expected.

The Rothermere and the Beaverbrook Press are, of course, insinuating for all they are fit that such miserable weakness as is now being exhibited by the Government cannot endure; but no one ought to pay any attention to what it (for in this case it speaks with one voice) says or implies.

As far as a mere outsider can see, the Government's position is just as secure as it was when it attained to power.

The Dock Strike.

One hesitates to bring abstract values into any industrial dispute, but the utter collapse of the employers' case in the dock strike forces one to think that the weight of Justice was in this instance too overwhelming for there to be more than one issue. As far as one can see, the men have won as complete a victory as was humanly possible. The result could be foreseen as soon as Mr. Bevin, who acted admirably throughout, in unforgettable contrast to some of his opponents, presented the dockers' case, and pointed out the fact that, generally speaking, dividends had been in no sympathy with the declining movement of wages.

The men have not won all their points, but, in the main, both in principle and in detail, the victory is theirs. Having won for them so easily, Mr. Bevin found it hard to persuade them that it was not possible to get a little more; but his quite statesmanlike attitude finally prevailed, and all the men are expected back at work this morning.

The strike has been compared to the affair at Luxor, in that whereas on one side was an individual opinion, on the other was a mass of opinion. The parallel is just in so far as it is expedient that both troubles should be forgotten as soon as possible.

Mr. Churchill.

The movements of Mr. Churchill are now attracting very great attention, and there is on foot a plot to return him to the House as an anti-Socialist. The member for Westminster has just died, and the scheme is to get the erstwhile Colonial Secretary returned for this seat on the Conservative vote. With some people Mr. Churchill's brilliance carries all before it, but the more Die-hard part of the Conservative Party is not likely to do anything but oppose bitterly the ex-Minister of the Coalition.

The Traffic Problem.

There is, of course, no solution of the traffic problem, which in London, at any rate, has reached a ludicrous pitch. The visitor to London may not notice that he is taking half an hour to get from Ludgate Circus to Charing Cross, but, if so, he must be blind to the scowls of the Londoner and deaf to his blasphemies. But although there is no solution, there are many schemes to minimise the problem, and chief of these is Sir Alfred Yarrow's. Sir Alfred offers to erect, at his own expense, a bridge over traffic crossroads. If at the end of two years his bridge is considered unsatisfactory he will demolish it also at his own expense. This attractive offer he has made to the London County Council and to the Councils of St. Marylebone and Westminster.

From the layman's point of view there is but one objection to this scheme—its inevitable hideousness. But in consideration of the fact that this is a wholly materialistic age, artistic objections carry very small weight. Moreover, when one has oneself to travel on omnibuses, one is not quite so sure about that artistic objection. Still, it will be interesting to see whether this matter will be referred, as it undoubtedly should, to the recently created Commission of Fine Arts.

Sport.

English Rugger is going very great guns this season. It is true that France had not her best team out on Saturday against us, but the ease with which our men got home makes us quite hopeful of securing the Calcutta Cup on March 15, especially as Scotland appear to have been lucky in defeating Ireland on Saturday.

Cambridge sports are rather under a cloud at the moment, and it was no surprise to see Oxford beating her last week at hockey. Oxford had a rattling good side, and it says much for the determination of Cambridge that only three goals were scored. Although the Light Blues had hard luck, it was impossible not to admit that Oxford was the better side. Cambridge, they say, will win the Athletics, but of the Boat Race it is as yet too early to speak.

Broadcasting.

As if people were not satisfied with the Americanisation of Britain as seen in our architecture, our cinemas, and our drinks, the wireless maniacs on Saturday tried to get into touch with Pittsburg (Penn.). The Atlantic, or some other far-seeing deity, was not having it at any price, however, and broke in upon the ridiculous variations on "Home, Sweet Home," that were being perpetrated by some American orchestra with the wildest screechings and swishings. The "atmospherics" were so persistent that Britain finally thought better of it, and gave it up as a bad job, with the result that the United States still seem beautifully remote.

But they will succeed one day—one can feel it in one's bones. Soon the world will be as bad a place to live in as is a small college, where everybody has to know everybody else. One has submitted to Manchester and Aberdeen on one's staircase, so to speak, but can one really allow Pittsburg in the attic?

Rent Restriction

The Rent Restriction Bill, which was read in the House of Commons last week for the second time, extends the period of rent control from 1925 to 1928, and, among other things, restricts possible rent increases to 25 per cent. instead of 40 per cent.; and the Conservatives are furious about it. Such artificial interference undoubtedly postpones the return to normal conditions—in which all our hopes of settled existence are said to repose—but the essential weakness of those who oppose rent restriction is that they cannot agree on the precise date when restriction should disappear.

Of course, the Bill has its injustices. It was unnecessary for the Minister of Health to say that his party had to consider the interest of the tenant more than that of the landlord, for that went without saying. But whether the prevention of extortion and the mitigation of suffering which the Bill assures are not better than the lack of enterprise which its opponents declare will be its main effect is a doubtful point. In any case, there are more tenants than landlords, so that it is, at least, a democratic measure.

"Back to Methuselah."

Last week, at the Court Theatre, as one hears on the best authority, Bernard Shaw's play, "Back to Methuselah," was played, and the most noticeable thing about the whole affair was the really heroic conduct of the dramatic critics, who, despite occasional weariness as the week dragged on, seemed to have listened to the greater portion of the five nights' words. Really this sort of thing is too stupendous for our tired humanity. I have seen no one after these five nights of Shaw, but one can picture them staggering wearily out of the bar on the last night, not quite sure they were yet pure intelligences or not. I forget, in trying to look at it all from the human point of view, what the bar at the Court is like; but, in any case, if Mr. Barry Jackson is a wise man, he will get it extended at once.

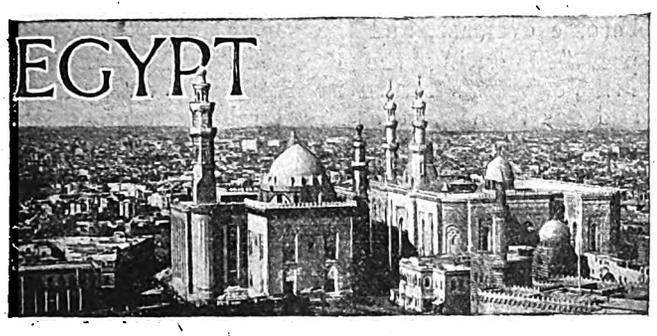
From Our Own Correspondents.



Cairo, February 17.

A Week of Excitement.

A week which was ushered in with popular rejoicings over the release of the military court prisoners has ended in a capital sensation regarding the closing down of the tomb of Tutankhamen. Where the liberated men are concerned, it is satisfactory to note that the attitude of the local Press, reported last week, in regarding the British Government's decision, not as a sign of weakness, but of a desire for friendly relations, has been maintained. On the other hand, there is certainly a body of opinion among the local British residents which thinks the clemency shown to have been somewhat over-hasty, or, at least, too general. It would probably be inaccurate to say that this attitude typifies the feelings of the majority of the British community, but there is a fairly considerable minority which holds the view indicated. Meanwhile, those of the prisoners who, through their conviction by military courts, lost pensions or other advantages, are having these rights restored to them. Notable in this connection is Abdel Rahman Bey Fahmy, ex-Secretary of the Zaghloulist Wafd, for whom, also, a Government appointment is to be found. It has been reported that he is to be given an Under-Secretaryship of State, but a later rumour indicates him as a likely successor to Colonel Whittingham Pasha, the retiring Inspector-General of the Prisons Department. It will be a striking instance of the vagaries of fortune if a man who last week was serving a life sentence for incitement to murder should next week become the head of the Prisons Administration. Anyhow, after three years of confinement, he will at least have the advantage of considerable personal and inside knowledge of the institutions which he is to control.

The Luxor Dispute.

Nothing since last summer's scandal leading to the resignation of Moheb Pasha, Minister of Finance, has aroused such heated controversy as is now raging around the tomb of Tutankhamen. Full details of the events leading to the closing of the tomb have doubtless been cabled to London, and there is, therefore, no purpose to be served in discussing here how the trouble originated. It is, nevertheless, interesting to note that Mr. Carter has had a very bad Press locally, most of the newspapers, whether English, French, or Arabic, taking the side of the Egyptian Government, though notable exceptions are the Egyptian Gazette and the Bourse Egyptienne, the leading English and French organs respectively, which are wholeheartedly with Mr. Carter. And from the comments of the other journals it is clear that they have, for the most part, preferred not to inquire too deeply into the real merits of the case—which, in the absence of complete knowledge of the facts, it is impossible to do—but, instead, to treat the question as one of national prestige and dignity. The Prime Minister gave them this cue in a speech on Friday evening, when he declared that the Government was bound to oppose Mr. Carter, because the national dignity was at stake. Neither in Zaghloul Pasha's speech, nor in most of the newspaper comment, is there an attempt to base a judgment on the legal aspects of the matter. Local opinion is inevitably based on the belief—previously referred to in my correspondence, and held by nearly every Egyptian—that archæologists are working in Egypt for the sake of the treasures they can unearth and export for sale abroad. Nobody, or scarcely anybody here, believes that excavating is carried on for scientific ends. There is an unshakeable conviction that Egypt is being despoiled of her treasures for the benefit of foreigners, and this belief makes it inevitable that, at such a time as the present, Egyptian public opinion should be almost unanimously against Mr. Carter. The fact that on his side are all the world's most famous archæologists carries no weight here, nor does the possibility that the Egyptian Government's present action may endanger the future of Egyptological research. Egyptians are not interested in the monuments of their country's past, and it will not worry them if the rest of the world comes to share their indifference. As for the danger to the tourist traffic, this is dismissed with the comment that the only people who benefit from the tourists are the hotel, steamship companies, and tourist agencies, and that these are almost entirely foreign concerns. This being the popular attitude, it can be imagined that prospects of the Egyptian Government's adopting a conciliatory attitude in the present dispute are not very bright.

changes in Government staffs or to dispense with the services of officials known for their past opposition to the Zaghloulist Party has been somewhat moderated during the past week by the compulsory retirement of Mohammed Mokbel Pasha, Governor of Alexandria; Mohammed Hilmy Issa Pasha, Mudir of Gharbia; and Rashwan Pasha Mahfouz, Mudir of Menufia. All three have long been well known as anti-Zaghloulists, and all have at some time or another incurred the hostility of the Zaghloulist Press. Mokbel Pasha was Mudir of Assiout at the time of Zaghloul Pasha's Nile journey in 1921, ending in what is still popularly called the Battle of Assiout, when supporters of Adly Pasha tore down the decorations erected in honour of Zaghloul Pasha's visit, and threw them (and some of the Zaghloulist partisans, too) into the river. Hilmy Issa Pasha, as Mudir of Gharbia, has had, in maintaining public security in his Mudiria town of Tanta, an unenviable task, and is now paying the penalty for what those whom he has had to keep in order considered undue severity. Rashwan Pasha Mahfouz has incurred similar unpopularity. While it would be unfair to deduce too much from these retirements, especially since, in the case of two of them, nobody can suggest that the public service is greatly the loser, though the third happens to be one of the best Mudirs in the country, it is generally considered to be a little unfortunate that these three officials should have been placed on pension simultaneously, and so soon after the new Government's assumption of office. It might have been more tactful to have waited a little longer. In connection with these changes, there has been a general re-shuffling of Mudirs, those of proved Zaghloulist sympathies having gained the reward of past services by transference to more pleasant and higher-graded provinces.

A journey to Upper Egypt during the past week has disclosed the fact that articles of various kinds are being constantly left in railway coaches, partly through the carelessness of passengers, partly through a less amiable weakness on the part of bystanders along the railway track. The latter was instanced when, during the night, a huge piece of rock arrived through the sleeping-car window, which, naturally, was smashed into fragments, which liberally bespattered the floor. The conductor, who removed the débris, explained that stone-throwing at trains seemed to be a popular amusement in Upper Egypt, for it was of constant occurrence. The culprit, as might be expected, was practically never discovered. The carelessness of passengers regarding their property was illustrated at Luxor station, where, in the Sleeping Car Company's office, lay a pair of silk pyjamas, a Kodak complete with case and sling, a walking-stick, and an overcoat, all left by travellers in the train just arrived. It would be easier to moralise on this very casual way of treating personal belongings had not the discovery of how prevalent is this form of carelessness been made through the fact that it was the discoverer's own overcoat which lay for some time awaiting its owner's realisation of his oversight!

GREECE.

Athens, February 15.

The Situation.

The Greek political horizon, which seemed fair and promising a fortnight ago, has once again become overcast, and the general optimism which prevailed during the first two weeks following M. Venizelos's return to Greece has faded away, and has been succeeded by forebodings of possible disaster. The change is due to the sudden illness of M. Venizelos and his eventual relinquishment of the Premiership, and to the stubborn insistence of the Republicans on forcing, one way or another, a Republic upon the Greek people.

M. Venizelos's exit from active political life was a heavy blow to his followers, and it can be safely said that it is only his continued presence in this country that is keeping the Liberals—who still regard him as their leader—together. Should M. Venizelos by any chance, either by doctor's orders or from resentment at the antagonistic attitude adopted towards him by many whom up to the time of his return he included among his friends, decide to leave Greece, the Liberal Party would break up without much hope of reconstruction. Fortunately, such a danger does not seem imminent. Your correspondent, however, has very good reasons to believe that should the Republicans, disregarding his advice, proceed to establish a republic by a coup d'état, the Cretan politician is determined to go.

Since his return to his native land, M. Venizelos has had many disillusions, and these were to a great extent responsible for his recent heart attack in the Chamber. His efforts to reconcile the two rival groups have so far proved fruitless, and even the plebiscite upon the issue of which he counted, and still counts, so much for restoration of internal peace, far from improving matters, seems likely even more to complicate the situation.

The position of Greek internal affairs to-day may be summed up as follows:—

The new Government under M. Kaphandaris, one of the most prominent members of the Liberal Party, has pledged itself to carry out the programme outlined by M. Venizelos in the National Assembly. The chief points of this programme are:—(1) The solution of the dynastic and constitutional questions by plebiscite, and (2) to spare no efforts for the restoration of internal peace and tranquillity. The Republicans, however, probably fearing (and their fears are not altogether unjustified) that the result of a plebiscite would be a majority for the monarchists, from the very first opposed such a solution, and insist that at least the dynastic question—namely, that the Glücksburg dynasty be declared to have forfeited its rights to the Hellenic throne—be voted by the National Assembly. For weeks now the best orators from the Republican camp have been trying to explain to the Assembly what a terrible calamity it would be if the plebiscite went against them and King George II. be returned to this country. General Kondylis even went so far as to hint that the 4,000 officers who had signed the protocol abolishing the Glücksburg dynasty would never abide by the decision of the plebiscite should it be negative, and that they were determined to prevent, by force if necessary, any attempt by the King to land on Greek soil.

Despite these flowery speeches and dire threats, the Liberals, supported by the majority of the Liberal-Republicans, insist upon the carrying out of M. Venizelos's original plan—namely, that the question be decided by the people in a plebiscite. It is generally believed—though it is by no means certain—that the Liberals, with the help of the Liberal-Republicans, will succeed in obtaining the confidence of the National Assembly when the question is put to the vote, but one is apt to wonder whether the extremists among the Republicans will be content to abide by the result and let events take their normal course. Since the beginning of the week the atmosphere has been charged with alarming rumours of an impending republican coup. We hear of mysterious movements of troops and of threatened resignation of militant deputies who are known leaders of the extremist elements in the Army and Navy. One report has it that all the officer deputies are about to resign in a body as a sign of protest against the procrastination of the Government in dealing with the dynastic question. The ex-Naval Commander-in-Chief, Captain Hadjikyriakos, who is one of the most fanatical Republican leaders, told the writer that his party intends to have a republic by peaceful methods if possible, and at the point of the bayonet, if necessary. "We have worked indefatigably for a republic," said Captain Hadjikyriakos, "and we do not propose to be cheated out of our just rewards; we believe we have the majority of the Greek people behind us."

There is a reminder of Kemalist tactics in the methods of these extremist Republicans. Just as the Turkish Nationalists pursued a definite objective in their dealings with the divided Allies, so are the Greek Republicans doggedly pushing their plan through the hesitating and weakening Venizelist forces, refusing to be swerved from their purpose.

A General Assaulted.

An incident which might have easily led to serious consequences occurred last week at the close of the meeting of the National Assembly. While the ex-Commander-in-Chief of the Greek forces in Macedonia and now member for Salonika, General Pangalos, was talking to another deputy on the steps of the Parliament House, M. Tzonis, an anti-Venizelist deputy from Arta, walked up to the General and, without warning, struck him twice in the face. General Pangalos, being a man of small build, and realising that his fists would be useless against the tallest member of the National Assembly, who is known to possess "the strength of a bull," drew his revolver. Fortunately, two other deputies standing near by promptly snatched the firearm out of the General's hand, and thus prevented what might have resulted in a grave incident.

General Pangalos has now asked the National Assembly's permission to institute legal proceedings against M. Tzonis.

The Exchange of Populations.

The members comprising the International Commission for the Exchange of Populations have returned to Athens after a visit to Angora and Constantinople. The President of the Commission, General Maurique de Lara, states that he has arranged with the Ottoman Government for the exchange of all exchangeable Turks and Greeks undergoing terms of imprisonment for political crimes. The Commission is leaving shortly for Salonika in order to supervise the work in connection with the embarkation of the Mussulmans, which now appears to be proceeding smoothly.

ROUMANIA.

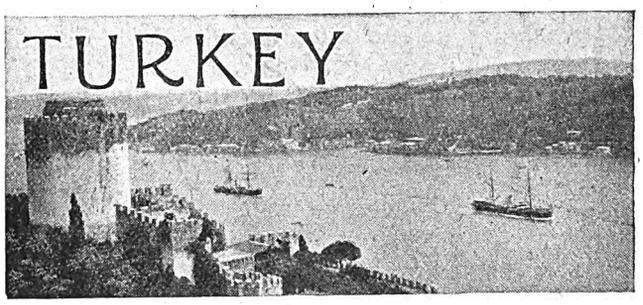
Bucharest, February 16.

Roumania and Italy.

In well-informed circles it is rumoured that the visit to Rome of the Roumanian King and Queen, which is shortly taking place, has political aims. Recently, in Roumania, a sharp anti-French tendency has been noticeable, and some politicians say that it was on the strength of this feeling that the 100 million francs loan was refused. According to the Novosti, this refusal was due to Italian influence. Certainly there are grounds for supposing that Italian influence in Roumania is getting the upper hand. For instance, it was planned that this spring the Roumanian Royal couple would officially visit various European capitals, and, first of all, Paris. Now, however, it would seem that London or Rome will be visited first.

But Italy is trying to influence Roumanian foreign policy in another direction also. For instance, one Italian journal, the Ecchi e Commenti, states that Roumania should not believe that the Italo-Yugoslav Agreement signifies Italy's help against an anti-Hungarian policy, but that Italy intends to be a mediator between Roumania and Hungary.

In Bucharest important changes are expected to occur from the new orientation, not only in internal politics but in external respects as well. Colour is given to this expectation by the fact that Roumania is going to sign the protocol on the Hungarian loan, against which Hungary forgoes the claims on Roumania for the requisitions made at the time of the occupation of Budapest by the Roumanian Army.



Constantinople, February 18.

Reversal of Verdicts.

The political developments which it is possible to perceive on the horizon have not made any very appreciable advance towards a closer view during the past week, unless the unconditional reversal of all the prison sentences pronounced by the recent Tribunal of Independence in Constantinople, now happily defunct, may be considered as a manifesto that the Government has put away childish things. In any case, they have done the thing thoroughly, and pardoned not only Lutfi Fikri Bey, but also the dock porter whose violence of language brought him into trouble, and the precieux young hodja, whose desire for cheap notoriety was his only sin.

The New Leaders?

It remains a question whether this belated amende honorable on the part of the Government will be sufficient to protect it against the assaults of the heavy artillery which is being mobilised against it. It is an interesting point that immediately after the well-advertised visit of the prominent journalists to the President in Smyrna, Hussein Djahid Bey has commenced the publication of his journal, the Tanin, daily in French. The initiative is a most happy one; the paper is well turned out, well arranged, and in almost every resepct will give points to every other daily paper in Constantinople. It will not be stretching things too much to see in that paper an exposé of the views of the most enlightened wing of Turkish nationalism—in a word, the views of those political leaders who hope to rule the destinies of the country within a short space of time. If this is so, it behoves us to study the opinions of these men.

The leading article in the first number of the new paper deals very significantly with the new spirit in Turkey, with the object of explaining it to the Occident. The general tenor of it is that everyone thought that the "sick man" was at last in articulo mortis, whereas he is completely rejuvenated, and although as yet he is not quite accustomed to the use of his limbs and thus steps into difficulties and impasses which might be avoided, nevertheless with a little patience many of the present mistakes will be remedied and the commission of similar ones avoided in the future. The writer is obviously penetrated with the desire of impressing the rest of the world with the magnitude of the task which has been accomplished by the Nationalist movement since its inception, and, on the other hand, he is quite frank in his admissions that extremely silly things are being done in the sacred cause of nationalism. The value of the manifesto lies in its moderation, broadness of outlook, and sober confidence, and in its affirmation that whatever internal political differences may exist, they will not necessarily develop into battle, murder, and sudden death.

Turkish Citizenship.

The publication of the revised draft of the Organic Statute of the Republic, which is to come up before the Assembly for ratification immediately, has drawn public attention to one of its clauses, namely, that which enacts that every citizen of the Turkish State is officially a Turk. At first sight such a clause may appear redundant and tautological, but it is not so. This affirmation of the principle of nationalism as we in the West have understood it for more than a century, is absolutely necessary as a corollary to the abolition of the capitulatory régime and the special civil powers of the various ecclesiastical cults. That the connotation of the term Turk should in the future include Moslems, Christians, Jews, and others is self-evident from the wording of the clause, and the more enlightened opinion of the country welcomes this clear-cut definition. To quote Hussein Djahid again, it is not to be expected that either the Moslem or the Christian will be able for some time to accommodate himself entirely to this new conception, and it may be added by this foreign observer that the Turkish Government has until now done everything it possibly could to enforce its view that no one but the Moslem has any rights at all in the new Turkey. One may hope that this is one of the mistaken lines of thought and action which is going to be scrapped. Unless it is scrapped, the new Turkey will infallibly collapse, for although, owing to the events of recent years, the attention of the world has been riveted to the schism between Turk and Christian, it has not been forgotten by the Turks themselves that equally serious difficulties with their Moslem confrères, the Circassians, the Kurds, and the Arabs, face the State. The vanished Ottoman power was strong enough to deal with these endemic diseases of the body politic chiefly by spasmodic bullying; the weakened Turkish power has to make a bid for their co-operation, especially when an attack of self-determination is making life unpleasant for the exiguous Turkish garrisons in the Eastern and South-Eastern Vilayets.

Compulsory Rest on Fridays.

The law concerning the obligatory Friday rest-day was put into force by the police on February 15 with such thoroughness that one was forcibly reminded of a Scottish Sabbath. It was impossible to obtain even a packet of cigarettes. It was, of course, the old story of a legislative enactment hurriedly applied by the police before the creaking administrative machinery had had time to provide the businesses of the categories exempted by the law with the necessary permits to remain open. All kinds of absurdities were perpetrated; one steamship agency was unfortunately forced to attend to one of its boats which had inopportunely arrived in the port on Friday morning. They smuggled an employee from their offices by a backdoor out to the steamer, but Nemesis awaited him on his return in the form of the ubiquitous procés-verbal and the equally inevitable fine. Apart from annoying incidents of this kind there were a number of real hardships inflicted by the compulsory closing of the cheap provision shops in the poorer quarters, where the inhabitants are unable to buy more than a few hours ahead. It is probable, however, that the rigidity of last week will be somewhat softened by next Friday. Some organs of the Press have pertinently pointed out that of all the proposals for the development of Turkey's trade which were discussed at the recent economic conference at Smyrna, the only one which has been put into force is the one which is bound to tend towards a reduction of output. There has obtained until now an easy-going system whereby businesses closed on Fridays or Sundays for a whole or half a day, according to their religious convictions, and the immemorial habits of themselves and their clientèle; it seems to have worked fairly well. Under the new system Friday will be ruled out as a business day, and probably the banks and larger houses will be forced to open for at any rate a part of Sunday. The case of the strict Jew carrying on a Friday-proscribed business with a predominantly Christian connection will be rather a hard one.

General News.

The new British diplomatic representative has arrived and exchanged the usual introductory visits with the authorities. He was caught by a representative of the Press in the person of a reporter of the Tanin, and on the basis of his cautious remarks to the reporter received a cautiously friendly welcome from the Press. So far, so good, but not very far.

The tourist season has commenced, and the first consignment of American visitors, four hundred of them, came in the "Belgenland" and stayed about forty-eight hours. They were lucky to strike the only two moderately warm days that have been enjoyed for more than a month. Within the next month or so further contingents are expected by the "Empress of Scotland," "Baltic," "Meteor," and so on. Prices in the Bazaar and in similar curio and souvenir haunts have moved up in sympathy.

PERSIA.

Teheran, February 4.

The Premier's Reported Aims.

Quite a flutter has been caused here and considerable interest aroused by the publication in one of the local papers of an article from the Constantinople paper Vakit attributing to the Prime Minister, Sardar Sepah, the ambition of becoming the Mustapha Kemal of Persia, and of changing the régime of the country from a monarchy under the Shah's rule to a Republic, with himself as President. The article was given much prominence in the local Press, and one of the editors interviewed the Premier on the question. The latter emphatically repudiated any such desire on his part, and disclaimed any ambition for rulership other than as the head of the Cabinet under the Shah. He went on to state that the form of government is immaterial, so long as he is permitted to accomplish his cherished hopes of being able, during his term of office, to extricate Persia from the present rut of misery and poverty into which she has fallen, enabling her, by being strong enough to stand on her own feet, to resist all foreign interference and aggression, and thus regain her once proud position among the civilised nations of the world. In order to attain this lofty ideal, Sardar Sepah solicits the co-operation and assistance of all patriots who, like himself, have the interest of their country at heart, to help him to achieve the three following essential objectives: The establishment and maintenance of order and security throughout the country, the advancement and spread of education and a knowledge of the sciences so as to render unnecessary the employment of foreign professors to teach in the schools, as at present, and, thirdly, the exploitation and development to the utmost of the country's natural resources and mineral wealth, to alleviate the present unsatisfactory economic situation in Persia. He stated, in conclusion, that a change in the form of government had not entered into his plans and had no place in his programme.

Rumours of Sardar Sepah's intention to bring about such a change have, however, been current in the town for some time past, and since the publication of the above interview the papers have devoted long articles to a discussion of the subject, in the course of which the Shah's repeated visits to Europe, which are regarded solely as pleasure-trips, are severely criticised, and much comment is passed on His Majesty's apparent lack of interest in his country's welfare, at the same time contrasting it with the Prime Minister's indefatigable energy and patriotism.

Railway Concessions.

The question of the construction of railways is receiving the Government's continual attention, and in this connection it is interesting to note that Mr. Bennett, a representative of the important group of American railway concerns, Ulen and Co., has recently arrived here. It is believed that his object is to negotiate with the Government with regard to railway concessions to be obtained hand in hand with mining concessions, one of the most important of which, the Northern Oil Concession, has lately been granted to the Sinclair Company. The results of Mr. Bennett's negotiations will be awaited with much interest.

Further Success over the Lurs.

The military operations against the Lurs continue, and the gratifying news of a further victory, following the occupation of Khorramabad, the capital of Luristan, reached the capital last week. According to the reports, the engagement lasted several hours, and the tribes lost severely in casualties, including some hundreds killed and more captured, among whom were some of the leading chiefs and minor chieftains. A considerable amount of booty was also taken, including several thousand head of cattle.

This latest success of the Government troops should be yet another step towards the ultimate complete pacification of the country, on which the Minister of War lays such stress, and for which purpose he insists on maintaining such a strong army compared with that of former years. The disarming of this tribe, which formerly successfully defied the Central Government, should have a very wholesome effect on the future security of this part of the country, which has always been more or less in a disturbed state.

General News.

Moshaver el Mamalek, the Persian Diplomatic Envoy at Moscow, has returned to Teheran to discuss, it is said, certain matters in connection with the Russo-Persian commercial agreement, negotiations for which have been dragging on in Moscow for over two years.

The winter has been late in coming this year, and until a week or ten days ago much anxiety was felt on account of the autumn-sown crops, in view of the lack of rain or snow throughout the country. The badly-needed snow has now, however, arrived, and a fall of some 18 inches in Teheran in twenty-four hours a few days ago was the heaviest experienced here for some years. This was followed by three days' almost incessant rainfall, and the dampness consequent thereon was quite unusual for this dry climate, and caused a certain amount of damage to the mud walls and roofs in the native quarters, for the stoutest of mud roofs is hardly calculated to withstand three days' drenching following such a heavy fall of snow.

On the occasion of the death of Lenin the Russian Minister and his staff received all and sundry at the Legation, an invitation being issued in the local Press to Cabinet Ministers, members of the Diplomatic Corps, notables and others, to offer their condolences, and most of these attended, including the Prime Minister. The Russian officials, departing from the time-honoured sombre black, all wore red bands on their arms in sign of mourning, the flagpost over the newly-built Legation in the former Atabeg Park was draped in red, and a red band nailed across the now familiar sickle and hammer insignia of Bolshevism over the Legation gateway.

The twelve aeroplanes ordered by the Persian Government have been landed in Bushire in charge of the Chief of the Staff, General Prince Amanollah Mirza, who is proceeding to Teheran. The aeroplanes are presumably remaining in Bushire for the present with the French pilots and mechanics who accompanied them from France.

BRITAIN AND ABYSSINIA.

Abyssinia is a country that does not often engage the attention of the House of Commons. It has, however, at the present time a special interest for Great Britain, and it was, therefore, unfortunate that the recent reply of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to a question regarding Abyssinia should have had to be confined to a catalogue of raids into British territory during the last twelve months. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald gave the details of four of these raids, of which only one is believed to have been undertaken with the object of capturing slaves, the others being in quest of ivory. As two of these raids have caused the British Government to lodge vigorous protests with the Abyssinian authorities, while a third protest will probably follow as soon as fuller particulars are available, it might be supposed that relations between the two countries are in danger of being strained. This, however, is by no means the case, and it would, perhaps, be well if the Prime Minister could avail himself of an early opportunity to remove any false conceptions on this point by a more exhaustive statement on Anglo-Abyssinian relations. Abyssinia, it is true, occupies no very important place in the scheme of British Imperial affairs, but it is the neighbour of two or three British colonies, and the Abyssinians to-day, in common with other backward peoples, are fired with new ideas which may raise them far more rapidly in the scale of minor world factors than seemed possible a few years ago. In any case, contiguity and old associations impose certain responsibilities upon Great Britain. Abyssinia has been admitted as a member of the League of Nations. Failure on her part to live up to her new position would bring discredit on the League, no less than on Abyssinia herself, for having rated the privilege and obligations of membership so lightly. It is, therefore, in the interest of any country anxious to further the cause of the League to do all in its power to help a weaker member, and consideration will show that Great Britain is more favourably situated than any other Power to point out to Abyssinia the way to political stability and material progress,.

The formidable list of violations of British territory that the Foreign Secretary gave to the House of Commons last week lends particular weight to the diagnosis of the situation in Abyssinia given in our issue of February 7 by our correspondent at Addis Abeba. He pointed out that the chief preoccupation of the Government was the means by which it could ensure that the obligations incurred towards the League of Nations should be honoured in the outlying provinces and on the frontiers of the Empire, as well as in and around the capital. In other words, Abyssinia's problem to-day is to secure a strong central Government enjoying the respect and the confidence of the rulers of the provinces. There is no suggestion that actual responsibility for the raids which form the subject of British protests extends beyond the districts inhabited by the raiders. The British Government is compelled to lodge its complaints in Addis Abeba, but it must be well aware of the difficulties of the position of the Abyssinian Government. In taking such action, therefore, it will be well to guard against the possibility of the protests defeating their own object by leaving the Abyssinians to imagine that Great Britain takes pleasure in urging grievances and that her policy is merely one of destructive criticism. They will be the more inclined to hold this belief if no steps are taken to correct the impression that any caveat entered by Great Britain at Geneva against the admission of Abyssinia into the League of Nations had no other basis than hostility to or lack of sympathy with the Abyssinians. Our correspondent, in the letter already referred to, gave sufficient reasons why Great Britain, in the interests of Abyssinia, should wish her to reflect carefully before undertaking the obligations of membership of the League. Now that she has been admitted to membership, however, the right course for the British Government to adopt is clearly to explain its former attitude and to leave no doubt in the Abyssinian mind of the sincerity of the country's welcome within the League. Only when this has been done will it be possible for protests against raids to be accompanied by practical suggestions for remedying a situation with which the Abyssinian Government itself seems quite unable to cope.

Great Britain's interests in Abyssinia may be summed up under the two headings, an effective administration and a prosperous country. With these two ends secured we may hope to be able to adjust any special questions outstanding between the British and Abyssinian Governments, such as the establishment of order on the common frontiers, and the regulation of the water supply for Egypt and the Sudan in so far as the upper reaches of the Blue Nile and the waters of Lake Tsana are concerned, and to further British trade interests. There is no reason to suppose that these aims have been lost sight of in the past by Great Britain, even if the advantage of such a policy from an Abyssinian point of view has not been brought home to the Addis Abeba Government. As we have insisted before in these pages, the more difficult the position in which the British Government finds itself—and there is no reason to suppose that in the realm of diplomacy Abyssinia has proved herself less of the Oriental than other Eastern countries—the greater the need for tactful and sympathetic handling. Our correspondent considers procrastination to be the besetting sin in Abyssinia, and attributes it to lack of education, lack of a strong Government, and the absence of any inducement to better themselves in the great bulk of the population. He emphasises, however, the fact that there are among Abyssinians those who are conscious of the national shortcomings, and it is with a view to strengthen their hands that the British Government should lose no time in making a straightforward declaration of policy calculated to remove all lingering suspicions from the mind of the Abyssinian Government.

SOME IMPRESSIONS OF THE GEZIRA.

By LADY RUSSELL.

After a hot, dusty journey, we reached the rest-house at Barakat, the headquarters of the cotton syndicate in the Gezira. The contrast between the flat, barren-looking plan we had been gazing out on and the fresh greenness of the trees and grass and the beauty of the flowering shrubs, setting off the cool and pleasant-looking bungalows, with their deep shady verandahs, which are typical not only of these, but of all the inspectors' houses as well, came to one with a great feeling of relief and thankfulness.

Whilst we stayed at Barakat we went out each morning to different parts of the Gezira. The country is the last word in flatness. After several hours' run in a car in any direction except that of the river, there is still the same endless-looking plain stretching out to the horizon, and, although there is a gradual fall of the land towards the west, it is hardly apparent to the eye. Except for some scrub to the south, where the soil is not well placed for cultivation, scarcely a tree is to be seen. The soil is a very hard black clay, which cracks badly, and after the crop is harvested and the stubble eaten off by the flocks of goats and sheep belonging to the natives, the soil remains without a sign of vegetation till the next rains come. One sees the lean, lanky animals still being put to graze on it and searching for the apparently non-existent pasture; it is a perpetual source of wonder how they manage to keep alive. To a newcomer fresh from England, however, there is a certain attractiveness in this sense of spaciousness, with the great expanse of sky above and here and there clusters of straw tukl villages. As the darkness falls the whole arch of the sky from the very edge of the horizon shines out with innumerable stars, and as the night wears on the Southern Cross slowly mounts up into the sky.

The most striking feature of the Gezira is the canal system. At present a main canal runs out from each of the pumping stations situated on the bank of the Blue Nile. From it secondary canals take off at intervals, and from these, again, the smaller ones still, and, lastly, the little channels which run between each of the rows of cotton plants. The canal banks promise to be one of the most pleasing features of the Gezira. Water is always attractive, even when running in perfectly straight lines, and already on the banks of the oldest canals date palms are springing up from the stones thrown there by the Egyptian fellaheen when making the canal. Demoiselle cranes, herons, storks, egrets, and water fowl are also to be seen along the banks. The water supplied to the land is regulated by a warden, who stands on the sudd or earth bridge that crosses the canal. These bridges are very rough and only just the width of a Ford car; they have a quite steep little rise and fall on each side, and at first one wonders whether the driver ever swerves a hair's breadth to the right or left and tips the whole car into the canal, but he never does, and so one soon ceases to wonder. Another pleasing sight are the great green stretches of cotton plants growing to a height of three or four feet, with their handsome dark green foliage, mallow-like red or yellow flowers and bolls opening out and showing their pure white fluffs of cotton inside. The cotton plant is here generally at its greenest and best when the dura has been harvested.

At present the Gezira is a country of contrasts. You can still see the native cultivator ridging his cotton, following behind a pair of bulls yoked together by a heavy beam of wood, and drawing the primitive native plough, and then, further on, you come across one of the steam cultivators belonging to the Syndicate going backwards and forwards on the fallow land between two stationary engines; or you will see bands of Egyptian fellaheen excavating one of the smaller canals, using their native picks and their hands as shovels, putting the earth into their mat baskets, as they must have done right back in the dim past, and then carrying it to empty on the side of the canal—and the next thing you see is a huge excavator at work on the new main canal that is to carry the water from the Makwar Dam, scooping up the earth with its huge shovel and piling it up to such a height that the bank looks like a miniature range of hills with precipitous sides. You can hear the throbbing of the newest type of Diesel engine which is pumping water at the rate of nearly 1,500 gallons per second, and which will, in its turn, be superseded by the great Dam at Makwar, which will allow the irrigation of 300,000 feddans of land, and would be sufficient to irrigate much more should it ever be required. You can then go to a native town like Menagil, where the people have to spend a great part of their lives drawing water out of wells 50 ft. deep by means of square pieces of leather fastened at the corners and sides with strips of leather, which are joined to a long rope, the advantage of this kind of bucket being that when it reaches the bottom it will open out flat and so get filled, however little water there may be at the bottom. They start early in the morning drawing water and filling up four-gallon petrol tins, native crocks, or any other old thing that will hold water, in readiness for the animals, which they graze on the rough pastures near the town when they come in during the afternoon to be watered.

The natives one meets are a very friendly lot with much natural politeness. As they saw us approaching they would usually slip off their donkeys and stand at the salute until we had passed; but particularly are they pleased to shake hands, touching their head and their heart to show their goodwill, while the women set up a shrill musical lu-lu cry, which carries a long distance. The West Africans from Nigeria, however, are the most friendly type of native that one meets in the Gezira. They live in their own villages, which are composed of tukls made exactly like straw bee-skeps on a big scale. Whole families leave their villages in Nigeria and slowly move across the land on their way to Mecca, taking years over the journey, some of them never reaching their destination. When they arrive at one of these villages they stop and work as labourers to earn sufficient to carry them on to the next stage of their journey. On their return they often settle permanently in the Sudan and make very hardworking, law-abiding citizens. I went into one of their villages to photograph a pair of women pounding the dura grain with a wooden mortar and pestle. As we approached, their head men came forward to greet us, and we were soon surrounded by a cheerful, grinning crowd of men and boys. We explained what we wanted, and then we all moved forward to where the women and little children were more bashfully looking on. The two women, who had their babies fastened on to their hips, were asked to go on with their work while I snapped them, to the delight and amusement of all around. These women are the only ones we have met with any love of bright colours—a refreshing contrast to the dirty rusty black or dark blue of the ordinary Sudanese women.

At present everything seems to be working admirably. The cultivators thoroughly appreciate the settled rule and absolute justice of the English after the cruelties and extortions of the Khalifa's rule, and they enjoy luxuries such as sugar and meat, which they are now able to buy with their increased earnings. They regard their inspector as their "father and mother," and come to him for help in sickness or in trouble, and the inspector, in turn, treats them more or less as his children, to be doctored, or dropped upon, or praised as occasion demands. One would like, however, to see the general monotony broken up somewhat, perhaps, by avenues of trees planted along the roads; a few mosques, with graceful, soaring minarets; and by each man's home a small piece of watered ground, where he could grow fresh vegetables, tomatoes, and water melons. But this may not be consistent with the growth of cotton.

THE CASPIAN PROVINCES.

On February 14, at the Royal United Services Institution, Captain L. S. Fortescue lectured to the Central Asian Society on "The Caspian Provinces." Mr. Fortescue, who was a Political and Intelligence Officer in North Persia during 1918-1921, dwelt in detail with the geographical features of the country lying between Ghilan and Mazanderan. He described (and illustrated with copious and excellent lantern slides) the rivers flowing into the Caspian, the watersheds, the nature of the Elburz range, and so on. The main difficulty of all this region, he said, which was by no means lacking in natural resources, lay in the extreme poverty of the communications: it was simply because Russia had been able to build a decent road from Resht to Kasvin and thence to Hamadan that she had been able to collar the trade of Northern Persia. The two things that appeared chiefly to be lacking when the lecturer was in these provinces were native comfort and native bravery, but, on the other hand, he found in abundance "fleas, camels, and princes."

Subsequently he showed most interestingly how caviare is prepared from the sturgeon, and commented pithily on the curious fact that by the natives both the sturgeon and the wild boar are treated as unclean. He did not appear to doubt the existence in North Persia of oil, such as abounded farther north at Baku and farther south in Persia, but he personally had seen no such traces of it as Colonel Sir Charles Yate after the lecture described. The lazy nature of the Persians seemed to make it inevitable that their State should form a buffer between Russia and Britain (India), although tribute was paid to the energy of the present Persian Premier.

Broadcasting took place at Colombo on Friday for the first time in the history of Ceylon.

One hundred and seventy Roman Catholics from all parts of the country started from London last week on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. Most of the pilgrims were middle-aged or elderly people, and many priests were among them. Cardinal Bourne will lead the pilgrimage through the Holy Land on to Constantinople and to Rome, where the pilgrims will have audience of the Pope. The members of the party wore a special badge inscribed with the Cross of Jerusalem.

"THE MACEDONIAN PROBLEM."

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—I have read the article under the above heading in your issue of February 7 with great interest as presenting the average opinion of a Yugoslav on the Macedonian question. I regret to find, however, that the article is so unconvincing. It might pass with anybody who is more or less ignorant of the actual position in that unhappy province, but it is hardly worth studying as a Yugoslav point of view.

The break-up of the Balkan League in 1913 is scarcely, as pictured by the author of "The Macedonian Problem," due wholly to Bulgarian treachery, but rather to the fact that the League in itself was premature, and that all parties included therein were more than ready to cut one another's throat as soon as the great enemy—the Turk—was destroyed. I would recommend M. Guesheff's book, "The Balkan League," to anybody who is really anxious to know the facts about the unfortunate end of that ill-fated and short-lived "League of Nations."

As to who really "liberated" Macedonia during the first Balkan war, it is quite absurd to say that Serbia did so. Bulgaria was attacking the Turks in their lungs and heart—Adrianople and Constantinople—and were keeping all Turkish troops busy on the main front, while the Serbians were making a military promenade through Macedonia. The Allies collectively liberated that province, each by their different efforts, and no one Power "liberated" that distracted country.

Further on, the author of "The Macedonian Problem" quotes an Inter-Allied Commission's report on Bulgarian atrocities in Macedonia. The author should not have quoted this Commission's report, because it was a one-sided Commission, run by the Serbs, no Bulgarian being a member; it had to accept evidence of a people then supported by a big Serbian army, and, moreover, the Serbs were in a position to prepare the ground for the advent of the Commission, whereas Bulgaria was not even asked to give evidence in her own defence. Besides, since a certain American sent a Commission into the Balkans to report on atrocities a few years ago, to which all interested parties were invited, Commissions have been out of favour in Serbia. The author was playing a dangerous game in throwing bricks in glass houses.

The Yugoslav writer states in his article that Macedonia was incorporated in the Serbian Kingdom in 1915, but he does not ask on what authority. Were the people asked whether they favoured incorporation, or was the incorporation just a Serbian decision? I rather think the latter. That the country, later, took part in the political life of Yugoslavia, as the author states, is hardly true. A population which is so restless as to need to be occupied with military forces can hardly be said to be taking a part in the political life of a country! Perhaps a few Serbs, employees, sent to Macedonia speak in the name of the people, but that does not mean to say that they represent the population which they claim to represent.

Digitized by Google

The question whether the province of Macedonia was represented in the Bulgarian Parliament during the period of the German and Bulgarian occupation is unimportant. What is more important is that the whole of the Macedonian population was with the Bulgarian during the War. That seemed a more appropriate post for the majority of the male inhabitants of Macedonia than sitting in a Parliament letting others fight for their homes. A Macedonian knows how to defend his home, as the Serbs have now learned.

In discussing the point of Todor Alexandroff the author just dismisses him as a brigand. That is the easiest way to explain away that patriot's existence. It is, however, a deliberate lie. Do brigands usually hang robbers and evil-doers after trying them and giving them means to defend themselves? Does a brigand forbid looting, drinking to excess, and the molesting of women? If the author is really sincere, I would advise him, for his own personal benefit, to go into Macedonia, where Alexandroff rules supreme, and then report fairly and fully on what he has seen. He would—for I do not doubt his sincerity—have to report that the province of Macedonia, under Alexandroff, is the most secure place in the Balkans for honest men, but about the hottest place imaginable for evil-doers. I naturally only refer to regions where Alexandroff's rule is established—namely, Eastern Macedonia. This "brigand" has his Courts of Justice, has organised the Church, educates the young, and protects the feeble in that region. It is very easy to explain when one knows these facts why Todor Alexandroff's head is still on his shoulders, in spite of the fact that it is worth a heavy sum of money to any Serb who has the courage to go and get it! If this man, who will rank in history with Boteff and Levski, is such a bloody brigand, why does the "loyal and contented" population of Macedonia hide him, supply him with money and men, die for him, and yet never, never betray him? It is a gross falsehood to say that this Todor Alexandroff is a brigand; he is anything you like, but not a brigand. Moreover, he represents the Macedonian population—no serious person would deny that—and is not an adventurer of any sort, but a patriot fighting for his downtrodden country, which at one time was master of the Balkans, and is now the footmat of those same peoples.

Now let me pass on to a yet more interesting and curious piece of news. The Bulgarian frontiers near Macedonia resemble a country "on the eve of war"! I do not know whether the author of the article referred to above really meant this as a joke, or whether he really believes it. On the Serbian side, yes! But on the Bulgarian side, neither manœuvres of troops nor transport of munitions give the country an air of war, for the very simple fact that in Bulgaria there are no troops to manœuvre nor munitions to transport. I am sure that the Serbian Military Attaché at Sofia would be more than thanked by the Bulgarian Government if he would point out these troops and munitions to the Bulgarian Government, who are extremely hard up for those very men and munitions at present, not for aggressive purposes, but to guard the "Pernik" mine, which seems to attract the jealous eye of her neighbour. In this article the writer urges that "British societies and committees publish the source of their information" for the Serbs' benefit. I, in turn, would ask, and even defy, the author of the article in question to produce any reliable information which confirms the presence of Bulgarian troops and the transport of munitions on the Serbian frontier, or yet on any other frontier. Such tales cannot impress anybody, and only show how weak is the Yugoslav cause.

The article proceeds to state that any minority could obtain guarantees from the Yugoslav Constitution, but in this case, Macedonia, it is the foreign element which is the majority and the Serbian the small minority. The Yugoslav Constitution hardly allows for guarantees for foreign majorities in Serbia, does it?

"That it is the plain duty of every State to protect its frontiers" is quite understandable; but it becomes difficult to see why the Yugoslav Government menaces, bullies Bulgaria, calls her everything black, because Bulgaria is not defending Yugoslav frontiers. If all these "bands of brigands" cross over the frontier, massacre and destroy, and then get back to Bulgaria safely, I should advise the Yugoslav Government to change its frontier officers. Bulgaria, however, cannot be blamed for their incompetence.

Believe me, Todor Alexandroff is very much on the Serbian side of the line, and he will remain there until he has finished his task of obtaining home rule for Macedonia.

As to whether the Yugoslav Government will have to consult the Macedonian people, Todor Alexandroff, or Todor anybody else, in the end it comes to the same thing. Alexandroff represents the people, and, through him, Serbia will have to consult the population. The sooner the better for all parties concerned, and for the Macedonian people in particular.

The fairest way by which the Serbians can abolish this problem is to hold a plebiscite under the control of some neutral power—say, Sweden, for example. Should the population decide that they remain Serbian, then Todor Alexandroff would ipso facto cease to exist as a personage of importance. The cost would be small, and if the thing were carried out fairly, I am sure the Macedonians themselves would pay the cost of their liberation with their worldly goods, as they now pay with their blood, for the privilege of being able to call themselves Macedonians.

The world at large is still human. The War has, for the moment, hardened hearts. Send to this unhappy province a group of honest folk, free from political and other prejudices, desirous of justice, let them study conditions, see the young and old dying bravely with the knowledge of the greatness of their cause, listen to these simple peasant folk pleading for their cause, "Macedonia for the Macedonians," and even the hardest heart would melt at the touching sight. If the world has no heart, it at least has conscience. Surely that conscience will one day speak, and, in speaking, free this tortured nationality, whose motto is written in blood on the rocky walls of Skoplje and every village and hamlet, "Freedom or Death." A people strong in a great cause can never die! Their spirit will live for ever!

This is the frank opinion, outspoken, but not unfair nor bitter, of the average honest man who knows the facts, whether he be Yugoslav or Bulgarian. I am, etc., PANAYOT GEORGIEFF.

BULGARIA AND BALKAN RUMOURS.

We have been asked by the Bulgarian Minister in London to give publicity to the following statement :—

A vigorous Press campaign is once more being directed against Bulgaria in the neighbouring Balkan States. These rumours represent the situation in Bulgaria as at present insecure, the intentions of M. Zankoff's Cabinet as not sound, and Bulgaria as liable to become once more the stormy petrel of the Balkans.

Deep concern is felt in Bulgaria in connection with these rumours, as the population feel that they are too often subjected to these strains. For instance, it seems at the present moment that the Press of the neighbouring Balkan States has undertaken to represent the political situation in Bulgaria as very precarious. These papers state that the Macedonian organisation is in full control of Bulgarian politics ; that it is openly organising a vast insurrectionary movement which is to take place next spring in Macedonia, and that the Bulgarian Government is either unwilling or unable to cope with these activities.

These allegations are totally groundless. It must be remembered that the same alarmist reports were issued from Belgrade in August and September last year, and that, nevertheless, the autumn passed without any of the announced perturbations having materialised. The same will happen now.

The Bulgarian Government maintains that since coming into office it has given ample proof of its pacific intentions and of its firm resolution to do its utmost in order to establish friendly relations of a permanent character with neighbouring States. This policy has met with the support of the whole Bulgarian nation, and has been unanimously approved by Parliament during the last debates on the Government's foreign policy. In accordance with the line of conduct it has adopted, the Bulgarian Government has expedited the liquidation of the requisitions enforced during the War in the Morava region, and, in compliance with the Nish Agreement, it has once again taken strong measures for the effective control of the frontier and for clearing the frontier zone of any subversive elements able to create trouble.

It is to be regretted that all these efforts, tending to dissipate the distrust of the Yugoslav Government towards Bulgaria, have not been appreciated at their just value in Belgrade, where every minor incident or action of irresponsible persons in Bulgaria is being taken advantage of to rouse public opinion against Bulgaria.

The Bulgarian Government is resolved to do everything in its power to avoid any cause of friction that might give to its neighbours a pretext for any unfriendly action. It is absolutely necessary that on their side the Governments of the neighbouring countries should endeavour to realise that the common interests of all the Balkan countries demand a general spirit of friendliness : that causes of friction should be removed on either side of the frontier, and that a single-handed policy can be of no avail in this question. It would seem to be the duty of the Great Powers, in order to avoid future conflicts in the Balkans, to exercise their influence not only in Sofia, but more so in the other Balkan capitals, with a view to effect a general reconciliation.

With regard to the recent withdrawal from the Bulgarian Cabinet of the Socialist Minister, the Legation gives the following explanation :—On February 16, M. Kasassoff, Minister of Railways, and Socialist member of the Bulgarian Cabinet, tendered his resignation. The withdrawal of M. Kasassoff is unanimously regretted, not only on account of his strong personality and the loyal support he gave to the policy of the present Government, but also because it shatters to a certain extent the established solidarity between all democratic factors towards the reconstruction of the country, which represents the unanimous wish of the people. The Zankoff Government assumed power in the name of this national union, and when, in September last, a reconstruction of the Cabinet became necessary, and M. Zankoff had to choose between the National Liberals and the Socialists, he decidedly gave preference to the latter, whose political ideas were in conformity with his own.

The resignation of M. Kasassoff has been imposed upon him neither by the Congress of the Socialist Party, which in its last meeting gave its approval to the participation of the Party in the Government, nor by the Socialist Parliamentary Group, but by the Executive of the Party.

The intimate motives of M. Kasassoff's forced resignation are to be found in the desire of some of the Socialist leaders to compromise the consolidation of the Democratic Entente as a powerful political organisation, which by carrying out the programme of the Socialists would, it is feared, diminish the importance of the Socialist Party and relegate it to a secondary place in the political life of the country.

It is necessary to add that the withdrawal of the Socialists from the Cabinet will have no effect upon the course of Bulgaria's foreign policy, which was closely defined in the exposé made by the Minister of Foreign Affairs before Parliament, and which was sanctioned by the vote of nearly all parties including the Socialists. This policy will consist in a strict observance of international obligations, and in the maintenance of good relations with the neighbouring States.

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London, W.C.2,
Tuesday Morning.

The Strike and After.

The dock strike has happily come to an end, and much sooner than seemed probable a week ago. But, as usual in these episodes, there has been a full week of cessation of work, and one may well ask whether this be inevitable, and whether efforts will not be made to effect a settlement in regard to other industrial disputes that loom in the offing before things have gone too far. It need not be emphasised that a continuance of labour unrest in this country cannot fail to be highly prejudicial to the prospects of a trade revival. No State, least of all so highly organised a community as this, can possibly hold its own in post-War competition if it is constantly to suffer from the bane of labour disputes A prolonged period of settled conditions is essential for the revival of British trade enterprise, and in their own interests, as well as in those of the community as a whole, it is to be hoped that the workers will come to realise this fact.

Developments in the Sudan.

The resolution with regard to a further guaranteed loan of £3,500,000 for the Sudan, which came before the House of Commons last week, is a timely reminder of the rapid progress that is being made in regard to development in that region. The loan in question is the last of three that have been arranged for, and will bring the total of the loans to £13,000,000. It was perhaps to be expected that in the new House the scheme should come in for some discussion, but it says much for the fuller realisation in these days of Imperial necessities that the resolution met, one might almost say, with unanimous acceptance. If there is one thing that is certain it is that this country must have at its disposal ample supplies of cotton, and it is to the Sudan that we must mainly look to meet this need. And, of course, every step we take to encourage cotton growing in the Empire will indirectly tend to render easier the payment of the American debt, since the more cotton produced at home, so to speak, the less will be our dependence on America. The present loan, besides furthering this good work, will favourably affect employment in this country, since large sums will be expended here on machinery and plant.

Roumania's Tariff Policy.

The statement of M. Gheorghiu on the Roumanian Government's policy with regard to tariffs, which is summarised in our Bucharest letter this week, does not throw any too definite a light on the Government's intentions, and a further report on the matter will be awaited with interest. The reference to the present tariffs being inadequate to protect the country's production rather points to the conclusion that the Government contemplates increasing the already burdensome restrictions on commerce. On the other hand, we have the recognition of the obvious fact that it is impossible to put an end to foreign competition, and it is most reasonably pointed out that the way to the improvement of the country's industries lies in the development of production and in the improvement and cheapening of products. To reconcile the two statements is rather difficult, and in the interests of Roumania no less than in those of the other Balkan countries one can only hope that it is the latter which will rather reflect the new Roumanian policy. While many factors have been responsible for the failure of the Balkan countries to recover rapidly from the effects of the War (as indicated by the abnormal exchanges) it is quite certain that one of the most important has been the failure of these countries to realise at all adequately the interdependence of commerce, and that the interests of all will be served by the freest interchange of commodities.

Bulgarian Tobacco Difficulties.

Last year Bulgaria had the largest crop of tobacco in her history. The crop is estimated at 45,000,000 kilos, or more than double the yield of the previous year, while it shows a very appreciable advance on the record production of 1920, which was 29,000,000 kilos. Unfortunately, it seems very doubtful if at present Bulgaria will be able to profit by this crop owing to the large carry-over from 1922, and to the competition from Greece, which has also had an excellent crop. The market for tobacco is a constantly increasing one, of course; but in present conditions it would seem that in some quarters, at any rate, there is a danger of production outrunning demand. When matters adjust themselves, as they will ultimately, Bulgarian tobacco will play the part it should in improving the country's exchange.

Expansion of German Shipping.

Nothing brings out more clearly the expansion of German shipping enterprise since the War than the figures for German shipping transiting the Suez Canal given in a recent report. For 1920 the tonnage was only 15,000; for 1921, 171,000; for 1922, 735,000; and for the first eight months of 1923, 749,000. The total is still far below the pre-War figures (in 1913 Germany held the second place to Great Britain with 3,352,000 tons), but at the present rate of progress it seems very probable that before very many years are past Germany will be nearing her pre-War average. These statistics have a very obvious moral for this country, pointing as they do to the fact that before very long our traders will again be encountering very serious opposition from Germany. We should like to feel that they were taking the fullest advantage of these years to establish themselves in those markets in the Near East and elsewhere that were formerly the special preserves of Germany. Unfortunately there is little real reason for optimism on this account, for our business men seem to fail to realise that even if the conditions for trade in the Near East are adverse at the present time, it is all the more reason for looking after the markets there in order that we may be sure of obtaining the orders that will be available when the tide turns.

British Nationals in Turkey.

British subjects who have been waiting to receive compensation for requisitions of property or other losses suffered by them during the three months between August 1, 1914, and Turkey's declaration of war received only moderate comfort from the Chancellor of the Exchequer last week, when, in reply to a question in the House of Commons, he stated that there was never any sum belonging to Turkey legally attachable by British nationals, but added that "consistently with the interests of the National Exchequer, consideration will be given to their claims." As has already been pointed out in The Near East in our issue of February 14, in which the case of the British nationals in question was set out at length, whatever the strictly legal aspect, there can be no doubt that in equity there is a close connection between the Turkish ship-money sequestrated by the British Government and the losses suffered as a direct consequence of the taking over of the Turkish ships. It might not do to admit any legal attachability; but the fact remains that the British Exchequer benefited to the extent of £5,000,000, and, if it can be shown that our nationals in Turkey suffered losses to the extent of, say, one or two million pounds as a result of Turkish indignation over the loss of the two battleships, there should be little uncertainty in regard to the form that Mr. Snowden's "consideration" will ultimately take.

COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY.

ROUMANIA.

Bucharest, February 4.

Question of Tariffs.

M. Gheorghiu, Minister of Finance, has made an important statement on the policy of the Government with regard to tariffs, a question which has now assumed special importance. The present position is that the tariff on imports does not protect home production, and therefore many branches of industry are in a state of stagnation. It is a justifiable demand that home production should be adequately protected by the revision of the Customs tariff of 1921. M. Gheorghiu recognises the unsatisfactory nature of the tariff, but points out that the Government in revising it is actuated by the standpoint that it is impossible to cut off Roumania from foreign countries. The aim of normalising the State's economic life would not be attained by completely putting an end to foreign competition by a prohibitive Customs system. In the view of the Government, this would render impossible the levelling of prices, and would injure the interests of consumers. The Government regard as essential points the development of production and the perfecting and cheapening of products. This, it is maintained, could be done by the reduction of wages, without which prices will never decrease. If the import duties were altered in such a way that foreign competition was impossible, this aim could not be realised, and, indeed, it would become more remote. It is but natural, however, that where Roumanian industry needs efficacious protection the Government will do its duty, and the supreme Customs Committee has been instructed to this effect. The Government will give important support to the home industry in the export line, and the export of some commodities will be promoted by a considerable reduction in the export fees.

Constantza a Free Port.

A group of foreign merchants and manufacturers has put forward to the Government through the Constantza Chamber of Commerce and Industry a scheme for the establishment of a free port at Constantza and for the equipment of the port on modern lines, provided the Government is willing to let an area of land to the group at a suitable rent. The scheme is of special importance in view of the proposals for the development of the port of Constantinople, so that it may become the centre of the traffic in Eastern goods.

Future of State Properties.

The text of the Bill for the commercialisation of the State properties is now available. The proposals may thus be summarised:—The railways, postal services, and the tobacco monopoly are to remain under the management of the State; they will be administered by a board of directors, auditors, an administrative council, and business men. The ironworks and mines in Vajda-Hunyad, Cudgir, Secramb, Baiamare, and Zalatna, the watering-places, mineral baths, fisheries, and forestries will become limited liability companies. Forty per cent. of the shares are to be in the hands of Roumania, 35 per cent. may be held by foreigners, and it is provided that home capital must always be in the majority. The officials and clerks of the commercialised works will be appointed by the Administrative Council, which will be elected by the shareholders, and not appointed by the Government, as was originally contemplated. The State will contribute as much as the foreign capital, and at most half of the total capital. A supreme council, which will consist of experts, will exercise a permanent supervision over the commercialised undertakings.

Bridges for Traffic.

I have referred before in these columns to the question of traffic congestion in London. As a matter of fact, we have by no means a monopoly of it, for all the large towns are now faced with the problem in a greater or lesser degree, but we have the nuisance in its greatest perfection. How rapidly the problem has arisen can be seen from the figures given by Lord Ashfield at the annual meetings of the Underground group. Before the War street-speeds in London averaged eight or nine miles per hour, and the figure has now fallen to four or five and even three miles per hour where congestion has become acute. London has thus achieved the unenviable distinction of becoming the slowest city in the world, and it is perfectly obvious that, given the existing conditions, the tendency must be for the reduction still further of the rate of miles per hour until an absolutely impossible position has been reached. Most people, I imagine, however, are of the opinion that the permissible limit in tedious traffic has already been reached, but it is easier to dogmatise on that point than to suggest a really efficacious remedy.

The duplication of existing routes either by subways or overhead bridges at specially congested crossings has long been regarded an obvious possibility, and this device will probably be given a trial shortly as the result of the public-spirited offer of Sir Alfred Yarrow to erect an elevated roadway at a selected place at his own expense. He has stipulated that the bridge must remain in position for two years, so that it may have an adequate test, and he will undertake to meet the cost of its removal and of the repair of the road in the event of the plan not being regarded as a success. Oxford Circus has been suggested by Sir Alfred as a suitable site, and he proposes the construction of a bridge in Regent Street passing over Oxford Street. It has been advanced against the idea of traffic bridges in London that they would not harmonise with the existing buildings, but it can scarcely be maintained that the architecture of London is so perfect as all that, and, apart from that, we have reached a stage when any likely remedy, whatever its extraneous disadvantages, certainly must be tried. Subways would certainly be preferable from many points of view, but it is obviously much easier to build bridges than subways.

While a series of bridges at suitable points would do much to ameliorate the existing congestion, it is scarcely open to argument that bridges of themselves will not solve the problem, and it would seem clear that we are nearing the point when certain classes of traffic will have to be restricted to specified hours. But, while with these and other expedients we may arrive in time at a tolerable condition of things, no ameliorative measures that can be visualised will bring us back to the relatively satisfactory state of things that existed before the War. For that we have to thank the dawn of the motor era. As I have indicated above, the problem of traffic congestion is not confined to London, but it is not even limited to the towns, for the growth of the popularity of the motor in its various forms has done much already to make travel arduous on the main roads at any rate. And this while the ratio of motors per head of the population is far, very far, below what obtains in America. But it is steadily increasing year by year, and, though we are not likely to come near the American proportion, because of the difference in the economic conditions in the two countries, it can easily be foreseen that within a relatively short space of time the problem of traffic on the main roads, more especially the ultra-popular ones, will become extremely serious.

JORDAN WATER POWER.

In the House of Commons last Monday the Colonial Secretary was questioned on the subject of the Rutenberg power scheme in Palestine. Mr. Becker, Member for Richmond, inquired whether the concessionaires were developing the water power of the Jordan; whether any electrical energy was being produced by water power; whether internal combustion engines were still supplying the energy for the electrical power; and whether, if the water power was not being developed, he would consider cancelling the concession given to M. Rutenberg. Mr. Thomas, in reply, stated that he understood that the works required to enable electrical energy to be obtained from the water power of the Jordan would be begun very shortly. In answer to a further question, Mr. Thomas agreed to consider the advisability of calling for a full report on the manner in which the concession is being carried out. The general impression in regard to this concession is that it is not a very attractive one from a business point of view, and it is a fact that M. Rutenberg had considerable difficulty in persuading the more knowledgable among British Jews of the chances of his concession proving a commercial success.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS.

NABLUS, February 2.

Owing to the heavy rains that have fallen this week there is good reason to anticipate that a more extensive area of land will be worked and sown than in the past.

Cereals show a slight tendency to fall. Oil maintains its former prices.

HAIFA, January 26.

Transactions in cereals continue active on all the markets in the interior, but, in spite of the fact that there is no lack of offers, prices continue to maintain a steady rate of increase.

JAFFA, February 2.

Much rain has fallen. If the present atmospheric conditions continue, the present year will be a good agricultural one for Palestine.

Latest orange prices, 13s. to 17s. per case.

NICOSIA, February 2.

Market generally extremely quiet. Favourable weather for crops continues.

A NEW B.I. STEAMER.

The single-screw steamer "Tilawa," built to the order of the British India Steam Navigation Co., Ltd., was launched at Hebburn on February 20 by Messrs. R. and W. Hawthorn, Leslie, and Co., Ltd.

The following is a description of the vessel :—

Length, overall, 467 ft.; breadth, 59¼ ft.; depth, 40 ft. The vessel is being built to Lloyd's 100 A1 class, and is constructed with straight stem and cruiser stern, with poop, bridge, and forecastle decks and promenade and boat decks above bridge deck. Ten five-ton derricks are fitted on derrick posts, ten steam winches are provided for the rapid handling of cargo, and a 25-ton derrick is fitted at the foremast for dealing with special cargo.

Spacious accommodation will be provided for first and second-class passengers, and, in addition, arrangements have been made for berthing a large number of Chinese passengers in the upper and second 'tween decks.

The first-class passengers will be accommodated on the promenade and bridge decks with dining saloon at the fore end of the bridge deck, and music room on the promenade deck above the dining saloon. Both rooms will be tastefully decorated. The first-class smoke-room on the promenade deck will be panelled in oak and fitted up in the Jacobean style.

The second-class passengers will be accommodated on the after-end of the promenade deck and on and under the bridge deck; the dining saloon is at the after-end of the bridge deck, and the second-class entrance hall and lounge on the promenade deck.

The vessel's propelling machinery consists of single-screw inverted direct-acting quadruple expansion engines, the cylinders of which are 29 in., 41½ in., 59 in., and 85 in. by 54 in stroke. The engines are designed throughout in accordance with the most up-to-date practice for reciprocating engines, and have "Cockburn's" steam stop and emergency valve fitted. A very complete range of auxiliaries is fitted, including main and auxiliary feed pumps by Weir, also Weir's feed heater, feed filter, and a 50-ton evaporator.

The machinery is designed to develop a power sufficient for a speed of 13 knots.

The christening ceremony was performed by the Hon. Elsie MacKay, daughter of Viscount Inchcape. The guests subsequently adjourned to the model-room, where the customary toasts were honoured.

CROP CONDITIONS IN IRAK.

The agricultural bulletin of Irak for the month ended December 15 gives the following particulars :.

The seasonal rains this year are very much delayed, more especially in Lower Irak, where the rainfall has been insufficient to be of material benefit in the preparation of land for winter cereals. In Upper Irak rainfall has been fairly well distributed, and cereal sowings are well advanced. Water supply for irrigation has been ample for winter sowings on the Dialah Canals, Amarah Canals, and on the Yusufiyah Canal. On the canals taking off above the Hindiyah Barrage it was found impossible to continue with the programme of water rotation pending repairs to the barrage with effect from the last week in August. This, coupled with the shortage of rain, is likely to have an appreciable effect in reducing the area that will be put down to winter cereals in the Hillah Liwa in the current season. The regulator on the Majar Kabir Canal in Amarah is having a marked effect on the river level; and the working of the regulator is greatly appreciated by cultivators on this canal and on canals downstream, as well as by owners of river craft.

The cotton crop delivered at the Baghdad Ginnery in the current year is equivalent to 1,000 bales of 400 lbs. of raw cotton, as compared with 300 bales in 1922 and 60 bales in 1921. A small quantity still remains to be delivered. The relatively high price of Rs.500 per ton now being paid for seed cotton is likely to effect a considerable increase in the area under cotton next year. Where facilities have continued to be fairly satisfactory throughout the season, the cotton crop continued to yield fairly heavily up to the end of November; but where water for irrigation was found to be inadequate to the needs of the cotton crop, the plants ceased to yield in many cases early in October. In most cotton fields the green vegetation remaining on the plants has been fed off to sheep, and the stalks uprooted for firewood. The average yield of 16 varieties of cotton grown experimentally on the Government farm this year is 1,537 lbs. of seed-cotton per acre, as compared with 2,110 lbs. last year.

A start has been made in issuing to cultivators improved varieties of wheat seed grown on the Government farm. Twenty-four tons of Punjab seed were distributed to landowners in the Amarah and Hillah Liwas. The July to November exports of wheat were 50,022, and of barley 56,126 tons; total 106,148 tons, as compared with 66,051 tons for the same period last year. The price of these grains continues to be very low, and trade is slack. The total exports of dates up to the end of November was 89,506 tons, valued at Rs.116,26,918, as compared with 82,049 tons, value Rs.101,03,544, for the same period last year.

Winter vegetables are everywhere fairly abundant, but the quality in general is below normal, owing to the absence of rain. The rice harvest is now practically completed, and unusually heavy crops have been harvested in most of the rice-growing areas. A good crop of millet has been harvested on the edges of the marshes in Lower Irak. There is a steady demand for this grain for export.

Good progress is reported with flax experimental work, and excellent samples of scutched flax have recently been produced. A consignment of 450 packets of silk eggs has been received from Europe for distribution in the coming season among cultivators. An increasing interest is being shown in silk culture by many landowners, but the erection of a commercial filature for silk reeling remains a necessity.

CONDITIONS IN BULGARIA.

The following extracts are taken from the report of the Bulgarska Banka dated February 1 :—

The bulletin of the Minister of Agriculture gives the following particulars regarding the autumn sowings in the country :—Up to December 20 the conditions had been generally favourable to work in the fields. The rains that had fallen, although rather weak, had moistened the earth to a depth of 10 to 20 cm., which made it possible for agriculturists to sow a great part of the area allocated for the autumn sowings. At the time when snow began to fall the sowings of wheat, rye, and barley had continued actively. The moisture of the ground was inadequate in many places, but because of the advanced period, the sowings, and especially those of wheat and rye, were carried out. In general, in the whole country 85 per cent. of the area cultivated in the previous year had been sown up to the end of December. The forecasts on the position of vine culture, cattle-raising, and agriculture are, in general, favourable. It is reported that the area devoted to rice cultivation will reach this year 39,960 decares in Philippopolis district, and 18,020 decares in that of Pozardjik.

The export market continues to be inactive. During the past month insignificant quantities of grain and tobacco have been exported. There have been no transactions in cocoons and insignificant business in raw skins. The situation in regard to tobacco is unchanged. Transactions are practically nil. Important stocks are held by the great export houses.

The traffic receipts of the Egyptian Delta Light Railways for the eleven days ended January 31 amounted to £E11,407, making the total from April 1 £E277,228.

THE GREEK SAFFRON CROP.

In 1923 saffron was planted on a larger scale in Greece than during the previous year, because of the favourable prices in foreign countries. Production, however, was not up to expectations, due to the dry summer weather, and the entire district yielded only approximately 30 to 40 kilos of "red saffron" (says the American Vice-Consul at Salonika, Mr. Sidney E. O'Donoghue, in a recent report). The flowers had matured by November 5, and their gathering was completed November 20. There were practically no saffron stocks from the 1922 crop, excepting less than a score of kilos in the hands of retailers and planters. The entire present crop has already been bought by French concerns at the reported price of 900 French francs per kilo. In Western Macedonia there is a tendency to cultivate a bigger area with saffron onions than previously, according to recent information received. Reports that planters are endeavouring to obtain saffron seeds from Spain are also current. It is hoped that with the adequate aid of the Government, which planters seem to have already enlisted, saffron will be produced in larger quantities in the fall of 1924.

THE CAIRO LUMBER MARKET.

Although an important local market for imported lumber exists in Cairo, no foreign purchases are made direct by local lumber dealers (says an American consular report). All such purchases are made by old, established lumber importers and dealers whose main lumber yards and central administrative offices are situated at Alexandria, the chief seaport and the so-called "commercial heart" of Egypt. These importers supply the Cairo market either through branch offices or through smaller wholesalers situated at Cairo. With the exception of shipments made directly to Port Said for the supply of the market which exists at that port, the various Egyptian provincial markets are supplied in the same manner as is the Cairo market.

A PALESTINE TOUR.

Under the auspices of the Jewish National Fund Commission a private trade show was given last week of a film entitled "A Tour in Palestine in 5683 (1923)." It took the form of a Jew from the United States visiting the Jewish colonies in Palestine, and depicted with much detail the work that the Jewish settlers have accomplished in the Holy Land. Starting with Jaffa and Haifa, where the need for ports was shown to be urgent, the traveller proceeded Eastwards until he came to the Jordan. By the time he had reached Transjordania, he had seen practically all the Jewish colonies, their modes of living, and their leaders. Particularly striking were the photographs of such places as Petach Tikvah and Tel-Aviv, and of such industries as the orange and the tobacco industry. The film is, of course, a work of propaganda, but little racial feeling is displayed except where the mud houses of the Arabs are contrasted pointedly with the more up-to-date residences of the Jewish immigrants. It will undoubtedly help the brothers in this country of the Palestinian Zionists to realise the nature of the work that the settlers are attempting to perform.

THE TURKISH MARKET FOR GLASS AND GLASSWARE.

Glassware imports into Turkey for 1922 amounted to about $60,000, which, together with imports of window glass valued at about $135,000, made a total of nearly $200,000 worth of business, says an American Consular report. Supplies were obtained mostly from Germany, Belgium, and Czecho-Slovakia. Turkey, and especially Constantinople, is entirely dependent upon the importation of such products, as the country is unable to supply them from its own resources. Belgium and Czecho-Slovakia supply the local market with window glass. Belgian glass is preferred not on account of superior quality, which is considered the same as the Czecho-Slovakian product, but on account of the substantial manner in which it is packed. Breakage rarely exceeds 2 per cent. The annual import of window glass is estimated at about 25,000 cases.

The quality of window glass in general use in Turkey is known as "Fourth choice Orient." As the name indicates, it is an inferior grade, and comparable to the C—2 and C—3 grades sold in America. Window glass is usually ordered in one or two thicknesses, "simple," or single-thick, and "demi-double" or semi-double. The latter is ordered in large dimensions only, i.e., when the linear sum of length and width exceeds 50 inches. Similarly, single-thick dimensions run currently from 25 to 40 inches. Thickness is actually measured in millimetres, as follows:—For single-thick, from 1½mm. to 2 mm.; for semi-double, from 2½ mm. to 3 mm. Plate glass used for show windows and silvered glass used for mirrors is sold by the square metre. For ribbed and skylight glass there is practically no market. Some ribbed glass that was imported on trial several years ago is still awaiting a suitable purchaser.

The conceding of payment facilities to local dealers by European manufacturers has been an important factor in the capture of Turkish glassware trade; price is the other consideration. Germany and Czecho-Slovakia have furnished the most, but with the latter country's currency improvement the import of Czecho-Slovak glassware has practically ceased. European manufacturers usually show a great deal of consideration for complaints registered by Turkish importers, and are quick to make fair adjustments of legitimate claims for breakage due to faulty packing or other defects.

Tableware consists chiefly of the various types of glasses, i.e., water, wine, and liqueur glasses, a type of shell glass used extensively for serving tea, also plates, cups, and dishes. Of the finer grades may be mentioned Bohemian crystal and cut glassware, the latter very often embellished with heavy silver bands. Glass ovenware is practically unknown, and there would probably be no market for it at present.

The Southern Punjab Railway Company recommends a final dividend on the ordinary stock of 7 per cent., less English income-tax at 2s. 6d. in £, making 12 per cent. for the year ended September 30.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Weaker.

The Alexandria Commercial Company, in their report for the week ended February 15, states :— Since our last report the futures market has been rather weaker. The recent weakness of New York and the very small purchases of Egyptian cotton by spinners since the turn of the year, have unfavourably affected our market. A feature worth noticing is yesterday's publication of the consumption figures in America of American cotton, B/s 577,000 against B/s 462,000 last month and B/s 610,000 a year ago; the figure generally anticipated was much lower. The New York market has not been influenced by this increase of consumption. Liverpool prices of Egyptian have kept considerably cheaper than Alexandria, and, naturally, the former market has again attracted the larger part of the demand. At the second February tender 1,000 krs. dockets were issued. February has again been sought after, at a premium over April, the explanation being the renewed strength of Ashmouni in Liverpool and the high prices paid on the spot market for this variety. Speculators continue to take but little interest in the market, and the open position must be small. We hear that operators abroad are selling in Alexandria against purchases in Liverpool; this operation might turn out profitably later on as the present parity between the two markets is abnormal. The week's arrivals amount to 110,250 krs. against exports 139,545 krs.; the stock stands at 1,782,538 krs. Spot: We have had a week of dull markets at Minet el Bassal, and demand from spinners has fallen off considerably. Sales amount to about 10,500 B/s, of which we estimate 6,750 B/s Sakel, 3,500 B/s Uppers, 200 B/s Brown and Pilion, and 50 B/s White. Both arrivals and exports continue on a fair scale, and the stock shows a further decrease from last week. There is no pressure by holders to sell, despite the falling off in demand and drop in prices.

Sakellarides: There has been business in all grades, and a little more demand for good qualities has appeared latterly. Prices of spot against contracts are without much change except for Fair and below and Good and better which are a little dearer.

Uppers: All styles have been dealt in. Prices of spot against contracts are a little easier for cotton from Good Fair upwards, but for Fully Fair and below they are inclined to harden.

Brown and Pilion: A fair business has been done. Prices of spot against contracts are a little easier except for Fully Fair and below, which are rather dearer.

White: A small business has been done. Prices of spot against contracts are unchanged except for Good, which is a little dearer.

The Right Hon. Walter Runciman and the Hon. Walter Durant Gibbs have been appointed directors of Westminster Bank, Ltd.

A Reuter message from Bucharest states that the Ministry of Finance has decided to allow the export of Roumanian Government securities payable in lei after permission has been obtained, this permission being required solely for statistical purposes.—The Ministry has resolved to redeem all the Treasury Bonds to the value of 98,000,000 lei which were issued in 1918 for necessary expenditure in Transylvania.

LIVERPOOL COTTON REPORT.

Business on Fair Scale.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended February 20 :—

Egyptian Spot.—In spite of a series of weak and erratic futures markets, the amount of spot business transacted this week shows only a slight falling off from the previous week's total of seven thousand. It is, indeed, a remarkable testimony to the real strength of the situation as regards Egyptian cotton that Manchester opinion, which is by nature "bearish," should have been on this occasion against the decline. It is some time since we have seen spinners so eager to fix cotton as has been witnessed during the past week, whilst the sales figures speak for themselves. Russian buyers have again been in the market, but only on a limited scale. It would appear, however, that their activities are not yet at an end.

A good general inquiry has been in evidence, and features worth noting include a greater tendency on the part of buyers towards the better grades in Sakellaridis, a further slight hardening in the basis for F.G.F. Sakel, and another reduction of a farthing a pound in the premium which spot Sakellaridis still commands over spot uppers. In Sakellaridis, the inquiry has been chiefly concerned with (approximately) good fair cotton about 25 on contracts, and F.G.F. about 100 on. The better grades, at about 300 on, also came in, as mentioned above, for an increased share of attention. On two occasions 29.00 and over was paid for extra fine Sakellaridis.

The upper market still continues to be somewhat erratic, and there are still a few merchants who are in a position to offer an occasional lot of "cheap" cotton, but this is now quite exceptional, and such lots disappear very quickly. G.F. to F.G.F. upper is on offer at "pass price" March futures, though we doubt if any great quantity is available, and in the good to fine qualities most holders seem in no hurry to sell at the moment, preferring rather to bide their time and await a further hardening in the basis. Experience has shown, however, that when the basis for uppers becomes prohibitive, that is to say, roughly, when the "400 on American" figure has been passed, consumers are apt to turn on to other and cheaper varieties of cotton. At the moment, fine uppers can be purchased at from 100 to 150 on, March Egyptian, with possibly a few small lots at something under 100 on. In brown cotton a slight improvement in the inquiry has been noticed, but little business has resulted therefrom. White and Sudan cottons have been neglected.

C.i.f. business remains quiet. Forwardings for the week ending 8th instant were returned as 19,493 bales, an unusually large figure, due to the imminence of the transport strike, which is now in being. It is interesting to note that the average weekly forwardings for this season have now passed the ten thousand figure. Estimated sales, 5,700 Egyptians and 50 Sudan. Quotations of Sakellaridis are reduced 120 points, those of upper and brown are 95 points lower. F.G.F. Sakel to-day 21.75d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ending February 23 states :—

General.—There has been a slightly more cheerful feeling during the past week than in its immediate predecessors. Inquiry is said to have broadened, and, in spite of the many adverse circumstances prevailing, a fair business is believed to have been done.

The dockers' strike, which commenced on Saturday last, is apparently on the verge of settlement, although the terms offered by the employers (which are to all intents and purposes those which the dockers themselves demanded) have yet to be definitely accepted.

It is thought that the dispute at one of the spinning mills, to which reference was made last week, will be settled, although in the present very unsatisfactory state of affairs in the cotton trade it would not be wise to take this for granted.

Yarn.—The turnover in American spinnings has been perhaps a little better, but the prices accepted by certain firms are said to be exceedingly bad. Undoubtedly, however, stocks in hand have in some cases become too large, and, presumably, a clearance at some price or other became imperative.

The ballot on the question of organised short time in this section has resulted in a vote of 87.54 per cent. in favour. The curtailment of production to 26½ hours per week will come into effect at once, and is to last until the end of May. Efforts are to be made to prevent the ignoring of the Federation's recommendation by firms who are members of it, and also to bring into the movement firms who are not in the Federation.

There is nothing fresh to report with regard to Egyptian spinnings.

Cloth.—The turnover has improved a little, and there has been an increased inquiry from many directions. India has taken fairly good supplies at low prices, and a fair business has been done for China. Egypt and the Levant also have shown a little more interest.

Raw Cotton.—This market is still in a somewhat unsettled condition after the break which took place in the preceding week, and fluctuations have been fairly numerous, although on balance quotations for American "spot" are little changed.

Closing prices yesterday were as follows, the figures for last week being in brackets :—American fully middling, 18.10 (18.24); Egyptian fully good fair, 21.75 (22.20).

THE AMERICAN COTTON CROP SHORTAGE.

In the report for February of the National City Bank of New York on economic conditions in America, the following reference is made to the scarcity of American cotton :—

The cotton crop is one as to which there is no longer any worry about over-production, the boll-weevil pest being responsible for this situation. The acreage last year was the largest ever planted, and the yield, finally estimated by the Government at 10,086,000 bales, is considerably below the amount required for a year's average consumption. Experts in the trade have calculated that consumption should average about 100,000 bales monthly below last year's in order to avoid a pinch near the end of the crop year. Foreign buyers have been operating freely to secure stocks, and although the Northern mills in this country have been curtailing manufacture, the Southern mills have not done so to the same extent. In the cloth markets resistance to price advances has been so strong that the level is much below parity with the raw material, but merchants appear to have been able thus far to supply their wants from stocks made from cotton bought under 30 cents per pound. The difficult situation in which manufacturers and dealers are placed may be seen from the fact that raw cotton for spot delivery is now priced at about 34 cents per pound, while contracts for delivery next October, when the new crop will be available, may be made at about 6 cents per pound lower. This means that nobody will want to carry either raw cotton or cotton goods into the new crop year, and all will operate cautiously. Much will depend on the prospect for the crop as the season develops. Undoubtedly the ruling high prices will cause a large acreage to be planted, but the weather and the weevil will be large factors in determining the results. That the weevil is not in complete control of the situation is shown by the fact that Texas and North Carolina—two States that were favoured with good weather conditions—both raised very good crops last year despite the weevil. The other cotton States had to contend with bad weather.

COAL-CUTTING MACHINERY IN INDIA.

Labour shortage in India has greatly stimulated the use of coal-cutting machinery in the Indian coal mines (says an American consular report). Most of the large collieries in the various fields are now equipped with electric power. Forty electrically driven coal-cutting machines were in operation in the Raneegunge and Jharria fields during 1922, and these machines cut a total area of 1,065.456 square feet. In addition, three machines operating on compressed air cut 190,890 square feet in the Jharria field. One colliery has introduced a mechanical loading conveyor which operates by compressed air. A movement is now on foot to increase the coal-carrying capacity of the railways, and also increase the output of the mines. The chief difficulty is in hoisting the fuel to the surface after it has been cut.

THE BELGRADE CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL.

The interest which the Duchess of York takes in the work of child welfare is manifested in a donation of £20 which Her Royal Highness has just forwarded to the Anglo-Serbian Children's Hospital at Belgrade. Whilst in Serbia for a brief period last year the Duchess found time to visit the hospital—which is run by one of her own countrywomen, Dr. Katherine Macphail—and was pleased to find that the Save the Children Fund was giving it all possible support. This is the only children's hospital in the country.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

NEW FURNESS WITHY MOTOR-SHIP.

The launch took place recently at the Pallion Yard of Messrs. W. Doxford and Sons, Ltd., of the motor ship Pacific Trader, which has been built for Messrs. Furness, Withy and Co., Ltd. The vessel's dimensions are 420 ft. by 58 ft. by 30 ft. 11 in., and she is fitted with the Doxford opposed piston oil engine of 3,400 i.h.p.

THE CORINTH CANAL LANDSLIDE.

The landslide blocking the Corinth Canal is one of the most serious since the construction of the canal (says the American Consul-General at Athens in a recent report). The closing of the canal is of great importance to Greece, as the distance from the Adriatic to Athens (Piræus) is 366 miles around the Peloponnesus, compared with 164 miles by the canal. The waterway is about 4 miles long and 75 feet broad, accommodating vessels up to 6,000 tons. Under present conditions, the cost of widening the cut would be about 500,000,000 drachmas, and necessary repairs are estimated at 5,000,000 drachmas. Meanwhile steamers that make the run Piræus-Corinth-Amvrakikos and Ionian Islands have postponed sailing, as the expense of a trip around the Peloponnesus would exceed the income. Steamers making the run Piræus-Brindisi, circling the Peloponnesus, are touching at Zakynthos instead of Patras.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Macedonia.

In the unredeemed days of German Imperialism the Berliner liked to whisper the story of a zealous policeman who, overhearing the remark "The Emperor is a fool," arrested the speaker and silenced his protests that the discussion was about China by saying: "You said the Emperor is a fool; you must be speaking of the German Emperor." We are reminded of the story by a correspondent who raises in this issue the subject of Macedonia. The question was asked last week in the House of Commons whether the Secretary of State for Air, in stating that Macedonia was mainly Bulgarian, and should receive autonomy, was correctly expressing the views of the Government. Mr. Lumley, who asked the question, added that "the speech of the Minister of Air was published in the Press, and had a very wide circulation in Eastern Europe." The reference to THE NEAR EAST which our correspondent sees in this statement was not explicitly made by Mr. Lumley, but we would not on that ground challenge the soft impeachment. It is clear, however, that the Lord Privy Seal, in stating that "the statement was inaccurately reported," must have been referring to a different report from that which appeared in THE NEAR EAST, which, in any case, had nothing to do with any meeting "intended to be of a private nature." The Government quite rightly refuses to identify itself with individual expressions of opinion made by members of the Cabinet. It is one thing for those Ministers who have had personal experience of the Near and Middle East to propound their views on Eastern questions, but an entirely different thing for the Government to take action intended to give effect to those views. Mr. Clynes had no difficulty in pointing out that Macedonian autonomy has but a most remote relation to British responsibilities at the moment. The chief matter for regret in connection with the incident is that the Government should be subjected to meaningless pinpricks instead of being encouraged to take advantage of its aggregate knowledge of Near and Middle Eastern affairs to persuade the countries concerned to deliberate with it on a peaceful settlement of outstanding questions.

The Way of a Settlement.

If any settlement of the Macedonian problem is to be reached it must be found from within rather than from without. To-day Macedonia is very much Serbian, but there are some hundreds of thousands of Macedonians unwilling to accept this position, and they constitute the source of trouble. Trained in the hard school of Balkan politics, they have no idea of any settlement that is not to be won by fighting, and they are prepared to face any odds in the pursuit of their independence. There comes a time, however, when this course of action becomes not only useless, but crass folly, and what is now needed is to convince the Macedonians that this stage has been reached. Their chances of holding out in Macedonia itself are remote: they gain nothing by involving Bulgaria in their quarrel, and the fate of Montenegro gives them no encouragement to appeal for the intervention of the Great Powers. There remains a method of attaining their goal which they have not yet tried—negotiation. Even if the prospect of success does not appear bright at present, the method has this advantage over the Montenegrin way; that, if success does ultimately come, it does leave some Macedonians alive to enjoy it. They can expect no military assistance in a struggle against the Serbians, but they might meet with valuable aid both within Yugoslavia and outside it if they could bring themselves to abandon the hopeless appeal to the rifle and try the conference chamber. They have already accustomed themselves to think of autonomy in a Yugoslav federation: but even that arrangement predicates some measure of goodwill between the component parts, and they are far more likely to find it round a table than in a campaign of battle and murder. The Yugoslavs, too, can hardly fail to prefer willing to unwilling fellow-subjects.

Britain and Turkey.

In his speech in the House of Lords on the second reading of the Treaty of Peace (Turkey) Bill Lord Curzon laid down in apt terms the lines of a commonsense policy to be adopted towards Turkey. The nation he pointed out, was passing through a period of trial, and he had no doubt that the present rather exaggerated and flamboyant Nationalism of Turkey would subside later on as the Turks gained experience. If Turkey chose in the recovery of her sovereignty and independence—which Great Britain not only had not challenged, but had assisted to re-create—if she chose in pursuance of that policy and those ideals to make mistakes, she would be the sufferer. Britons should realise the tremendous difficulty of her task and give her what assistance they could, and in what measure they could. "Let us devote ourselves," Lord Curzon urged in conclusion, "with as much devotion and sincerity as we can to assisting our old friend Turkey, and our former ally Turkey in the difficult future that lies before her." Throughout the debate, indeed, there was nothing to suggest the attitude of ingrained hostility that Turkish suspicion has fastened upon British policy. Even when reference was made to the Christian minorities in Turkey such speakers as the Archbishop of York were content, while lamenting the inadequate provision for protection contained in the Treaty of Lausanne to express the hope that by means of the League of Nations Turkey would be held to such obligations as she had accepted for the protection of these minorities. The fact is that British public opinion, in so far as it concerns itself with the Turks, wishes the new Turkey well; and if it criticises some of the acts of new Turkey it is because experience and its administrative instinct tell it that these acts are likely to prove a serious handicap to her making good.

Turkey's Problem.

Instead of elaborating a hard-and-fast programme for the Turkish Republic, Mustapha Kemal Pasha confined his remarks in the National Assembly last week to general terms, to which little exception can be taken. He was at pains to emphasise the necessity of modernising Turkey. Only the future can show whether it is possible to graft Western methods on to an excessive hatred of Westerners. The new Republic has clearly not appreciated the wisdom of hastening slowly; it wants to be rid of foreigners before it has had time to take full advantage of their presence in Turkey. In the same way, it seems bent on bringing the question of the Khalifate to a head before it has had time to take full stock of the position. Having satisfied itself that the Khalif of its own nomination must of necessity be a centre of intrigue against the republican régime (although its Court of Inquisition failed completely to discover any confirmation of this suspicion), the Government appears to have decided to expel the whole House of Othman without waiting to gauge the effect of such a step on Turkish unity. It may be that bold measures will succeed where more cautious steps would fail; but the warning since issued against participation on the part of Turks in the Mecca pilgrimage suggests that the authorities foresee the possibility of difficulties arising as a result of their rather drastic action against the titular head of the Moslem religion.

Greece's Constitutional Crisis.

During the past week the Greek Chamber has accorded a vote of confidence to the new Prime Minister, M. Kaphandaris, and has passed the Government's Bill for the holding of a plebiscite to enable the people to decide on the dynastic and constitutional questions. The Chamber remains wholly republican in composition, the point at issue between the Venizelists and the avowed Republicans being whether the Chamber or the electorate should first decide the matter. Now that the extremists have been defeated in Parliament, it remains to be seen whether they will attempt the coup d'état that they have threatened before the plebiscite. If the latter should go against them their action will depend mainly on the hold that they have on the army. In the meantime some moderates have given a lead to the Royalists by denouncing General Metaxas's tactics and have advocated the duty of participating in the plebiscite. There is no other practical course open to them, and from the party's point of view the only matter for regret is that it should not have been taken before, so that so much valuable time needed for organising the party should not have been lost. In political circles in Athens, it will be noted, no doubt exists as to the result of the plebiscite. M. Venizelos's utterances suggest that with the establishment of a republic Greek affairs will enter upon a normal stage, and he hopes to enlist British help in a big refugee settlement scheme in Macedonia and Thrace.

Lord Olivier on India.

Lord Olivier's first public pronouncement on the political situation in India must have been a bitter disappointment to those politicians who, misled either by irresponsible talk here, or by their own prolific imagination, had expected that Labour, like an Asiatic despot, would celebrate its accession to power by scattering indiscriminate largesse. To other classes of readers the statement comes as evidence that the new Secretary of State has correctly grasped the attitude of the British democracy, which has the last word in the matter, and, speaking for ourselves, we have no desire to criticise the details of an exposition which shows a definite approximation to the view put forward consistently in these columns: that certain ugly facts must be kept in sight, that India is much bigger than Delhi, and that a democratic Constitution needs firm foundations in a wide electorate. We welcome the statement that the Government is looking for practical means of establishing closer contact and a better understanding, and we welcome equally the evidence afforded by Lord Olivier that Ministers are not disposed to be rushed: the situation can certainly be improved by good will, but little can be hoped for if all the good will is on one side.

The Earl of Balfour's Verdict.

Next to Lord Olivier's statement, the most interesting feature of the Lords' debate was the intervention of the Earl of Balfour with a brief but merciless analysis of the actual situation. He insisted on the extraordinary difficulty of the task we have undertaken in establishing free institutions in a country where absolute government is the natural organisation of society, and he brought out very clearly the fact that the bulk of educated Indians have so far failed to render any effective help in the work. They have learned to play politics, but they have not shown any real desire to make the government of their country work: they are eager to destroy, but not to build; and to grant their demands would involve a reversion to all that is least good in the natural growth of Indian society, or, as we have often said, would lead straight back to the old India from which we are attempting to escape. We have no doubt that the speech will excite much resentment in some circles in Delhi, and that the veteran critic will be roundly abused in the extremist Press, but we are not without hope that some Indian readers may profit by the incisive judgment of the greatest living Parliamentarian.

The Indian Budget.

The first reports of Sir Basil Blackett's Budget statement make pleasant reading, and indicate that, subject to the accidents of politics, the finances of the Indian Empire have now been fairly extricated from the mess into which they had fallen. The current year's accounts should practically balance, and they will benefit by a substantial windfall in addition; the floating debt has been reduced to manageable proportions, and the necessary remittances to England have been successfully arranged. For next year a surplus is in sight, and there are hopes that no external loan will be required, though, of course, there will be borrowing in India for productive purposes. The real difficulty arises in allocating the surplus, because here political considerations come into play. On purely economic grounds we are disposed to agree with the view expressed by Sir Basil that the whole amount should go in reduction of the provincial contributions, but the salt tax was undoubtedly an issue in the recent election, and it is perhaps only fair that legislators should have a chance of honouring the bills which they drew so freely during the campaign. A final opinion on this point, as well as some others, must, however, be deferred until the actual figures have been examined in greater detail.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

The Bridge Across the Channel.

Whatever may be thought about the correspondence between M. Poincaré and Mr. Ramsay MacDonald in France, there is no doubt that in this country a favourable impression was caused by the publication on Monday morning of the two letters. It is impossible not to be struck by the sincerity of the two very different epistles, and though the French Premier returns a Roland for every Oliver that our own Premier produces, one cannot doubt that opinion is being sympathetically moulded by the two Premiers' words. At least, we are now in a cleaner atmosphere, and at grips with what Mr. MacDonald calls the "fundamentals," as opposed to the merely "important" points round which in the past so many petty intrigues were spun.

Mr. MacDonald shows an appreciation of the issues of which one had previously thought him incapable—he is travelling very fast and wide now that he has responsibilities, and one wonders how he will explain such courtesy to, and sympathy with, France to his erstwhile followers, who, like himself, were pacifists during the War. The establishment of contact between realities and the Premier's theories is producing most heartening results, and so long as he moves towards, and not away from, the immovable, stedfast France, there is real hope of a settlement. If his subsequent acts are in harmony with his present words he will have deserved amazingly well of his country.

The Government's Team-work.

The most amazing thing about the present Government's tenancy of office is its painful lack of team-work. Nothing is thought out, no emergencies are prepared for, and the ineptitude of the Government Whips is, I am told, remarkable. Some observers, indeed, are of opinion that the Government will not last two months if the Whips do not pull themselves together.

That criticism is, however, from the point of view of internal organisation, but from the public point of view, and particularly on the question of Cabinet responsibility, which the people of this country understand very well, the Government is surely appearing in the guise of a one-man show, a show staged by a man who is finding it practically impossible to be producer, prompter and leading actor at one and the same time. Two notorious cases of a breach of the rule of Cabinet responsibility arose last week over the remarks by the Home Secretary on the Versailles Treaty and by the Secretary for Air on the question of Macedonia. Both these officials spoke as individuals on matters upon which the Government has not yet made up, or, at any rate, has not expressed, its mind. The natural result has been a thorough exposure of both of them in the House, so thorough, indeed, that the Premier lapsed into warmth and the Lord Privy Seal into the most Conservative ambiguity in the defence of them.

Much the more serious misdemeanour was that committed by Mr. Henderson. He certainly ought to have realised the gravity of his statement that the Treaty of Versailles must be scrapped; whether, as is generally thought, he was speaking from a brief, prepared for the benefit of the Labour Party as a whole, or, as nobody believes, he was merely giving utterance to a personal view, the extent of his sin was enormous, and was in no sense diminished by the Premier's exclamation that the pother raised by the Home Secretary's speech was only a party manœuvre. Mr. MacDonald will manifestly have in future to keep a much stricter rein on his wayward steeds.

The Burnley Election.

The Home Secretary found a safe seat at Burnley, and must be well pleased with his 7,000 majority. "Uncle Arthur," as he is known to those of all parties who are aware either of his human qualities or of the limits of his cerebral faculties, was considerably aided by the weak attitude of the Liberals. It seems that of the Liberal votes, 7,731 were cast for Mr. Henderson, 3,337 for his Conservative opponent, and 2,484 are unaccounted for; and that is a fair indication of the dilemma in which Liberals now find themselves.

The Liberals.

If the Liberals are not dead—and they are, of course, owing to the feebleness of their rivals, far from eclipse—they ought to be. Even their friends were stung to shame by their abject display in the House last week. After coming out strongly against the Government's policy in regard to Poplar, they collapsed, when it came to the test, like so many tattered cards. Let it be admitted that the Minister of Health made out a surprisingly good case for the Government, his success was largely due to the pitiful showing of the Opposition. If the Liberals fail in their policy of petty obstruction, what in the world are they any use for?

One and Twenty.

When the present mystery surrounding the problem of the sexes is dissolved, the people of the future will assuredly marvel at the fatuities committed in the name of democracy. In the House of Commons a day or two ago a Bill got through its second reading for reducing the age of female voters from thirty to twenty-one. Most of its opponents seemed to fasten on to the fact that if the Bill becomes law the male voters of the country will easily be outnumbered by the female.

That, however, is the least of its evils. The tragedy, which was welcomed in the House with shouts of triumph, is that so many people should be found in this country who prefer the pursuit of logic to the exercise of common sense. Had any of the members who supported the Bill, one wonders, ever heard the political wisdom that flows from the rouged lips of our sweet one-and-twenties? Babbling nonsense enough it is from our males; but whoever in this narrow world, outside a handful of maniacs for impossible equality, imagines that a female of twenty-one will know what to do with a vote?

When wisdom descends upon our undeserving nation again, the vote will probably be taken away from everyone under the age of forty.

The Wireless Report.

Delay in the organisation of an Empire wireless service has followed delay, but at last the committee which has been set up under Mr. Robert Donald has apparently settled the question by declaring for State ownership and management, through the Post Office, of all wireless stations in this country used for communicating with the various parts of the Empire. Great disappointment appears to be experienced by the Marconi Company, who hoped to get the contract. In such a matter, however, it is not for the layman to say whether or not it would have been better to give a monopoly to a private company.

The Plight of the Hebrides.

One of the most amazing psychological results of the War upon the British people is to be seen in the constant attempts to help the War-victims of ex-enemy countries. Speaking generally, this has not been a healthy sign, but rather a symptom of muddle-headedness. Now, however, a chance presents itself to perform a charity which must universally be regarded as deserving—I refer to the plight of the Hebrides.

You may often hear Englishmen rail against the conquering Scot, but you will never hear a word against the Hebridean. These lonely islands breed a beautiful type of man, independent, reticent, and home-loving. Owing to the recent terrific rains, their scanty crops of potatoes have been almost ruined, and their peat cannot be dried. The inhabitants are not appealing against the hand of Fate, but the Lord Mayor has opened a fund for their relief, so that even those who feel that the survival of Bolshevists and Germans is the main thing in life at the present moment may be tempted to subscribe. As one proof out of many that the Hebrideans should not be allowed to suffer irremediable hardship may be mentioned the fact that the folksongs which they have created are the most haunting in the world, not being exceeded even by the Irish in depth.

Lunacy Laws.

Every now and then we learn that a certain section of our laws is obsolete and, indeed, unjust. A good deal of protest is being made at the moment that our Lunacy Laws are the last word in injustice. It would appear from the judgment recently given in the case of a man who sued two doctors for wrongful detention in an asylum that these laws need complete overhauling, and it is not improbable that a Royal Commission will be appointed to inquire into the matter. Obviously, medical responsibility will in the future be more onerous, and the reluctance thus induced to declare a man insane may, in its turn, become a danger to the public.

It will have to be decided whether the danger of keeping sane men in asylums is greater than that of allowing insane men perfect liberty. From the human point of view one would say "Yes"; from the State's point of view, perhaps "No."

Much Ado About Nobody.

One of the most curious delusions of the Press is its persistent belief that the public is still interested in the sayings and doings of the Duke of Northumberland and of Mr. Lloyd George. For the truth is that for the time being these two men have ceased to count. The Welsh politician has taken up with zest his pre-War habit of peer-baiting, but so long as he tries only to catch small fry no one will greet him with the sought for "What have you caught?" At present Mr. George's basket is absolutely empty.

Tudor Music.

There cannot be many more schools of music to discover, although there may well be many more rediscoveries—e.g., the revival of Mendelssohn. Some of these discoveries are a mere affair of fashion, but among them the present love for Tudor music cannot be included. No one can possibly doubt that England is now well aware of the beauties of its sixteenth-century music, and it was not surprising, therefore, to find recently, at the Æolian Hall, a crowd of people (with no shingles or side-whiskers among them, to prove that it was not a mere craze), listening intently to two fairly indifferent performers of instrumental and vocal Tudor music. Now it is pleasant to hear the virginals accompanying the voice, but as a solo instrument it becomes monotonous to our modern ears. Henry VIII., it is said, died possessed of thirty or forty virginals, but from what we know of his character, that hardly proves that he loved to hear the instrument on solo work. It was in vocal music that the Tudor composers were supreme.

Of this recital it may be said that Miss Margaret Glyn's diligence on the virginals met with great success, and that Miss Standfield's choice of songs, the words of which must have been known to nearly the whole audience, was fortunately made indeed.

Canals.

Ever since the War plans have been put forward for the canalisation of Britain. Some of them have been founded as a cure for unemployment—Sir Ian Hamilton's plans for the canalisation of Scotland, for example—and some with the idea of benefiting some particular district. Among these latter the most important is the scheme to make a seaport of Birmingham. It is being proposed to make from this rich city a deep water-way to the Bristol Channel. They are clever men in Birmingham, and are now waiting to see what they can get from the State. It is supposed that the realisation of the scheme would cost about two and a-half million pounds, and, in connection with this, it is said that the late Government were willing to concede half the interest on the outlay for a period of fifteen years.

Manchester, of course, made its canal on its own initiative, but nowadays no one attempts to do what the State may possibly do for him. Apart do what the State may possibly do for him.

The Obsession of the Tomb.

The Tomb, and nothing but the Tomb, has been the topic of the week. Ink has flowed in streams regarding the merits of the dispute, which every writer professes to regret, but, at the same time, seems to do his best to embitter. While it is possible to believe the declaration of the Prime Minister to the correspondent of The Times that his Government's action has never been influenced by national feelings, there is no doubt whatever that the local Press has taken into consideration very little else. On the other hand, although there is nothing easier and more irritating than wisdom after the event, it is impossible not to deplore the manner in which Mr. Carter has defended his rights. When everything was on his side, and judicious action would have gained for him the sympathy of all but the most prejudiced, he threw away his case by an unpremeditated act, which was followed up by quite the wrong kind of tactics. Where diplomacy might have won, pugnacity was used, with failure as the result. In the East, more than anywhere else, it is of no use to threaten your opponent with a stick unless, in the last resort, you are prepared to hit, good and hard. If the Oriental knows that, behind the threat, there is lacking either the power or the will to carry it out, he calls your bluff every time. And that is just what the Egyptian Government has done. Mr. Carter, not unnaturally, since he is an archæologist and not an intriguer, has fallen into what looks like a carefully prepared trap. At the same time, it must be admitted that the Egyptian Government has played its cards cleverly, and if the new offer to Lady Carnarvon is accepted, the Government will leave the field of battle with its colours flying. The worst feature of the whole business is that the strained relations which made what might have been merely an incident into the cause of a rupture, were persistently made worse by the campaign waged by the British journalists and journals opposed to The Times' publicity contract. Of this nobody who knows the facts has any doubt. The correspondents at Luxor have, during two winters, been deliberately trying to create around the question of the tomb the national prejudice which has now found its expression. If all the facts of this campaign were made public, they would throw much discredit on British journalism.

The Senatorial Elections.

With the tomb monopolising public attention, hardly anyone has spared a thought for the Senatorial elections, which passed off to-day in complete calm. Under the Egyptian Constitution, polling for the Upper Chamber is not an exciting event, for only one in every 150 of the electorate survives the two preliminary stages of the elimination plan which is followed. Besides, there is no sort of doubt regarding the way in which the contests have gone, although most of the results will not be known until to-morrow morning. In the seventy-three constituencies into which, for the purpose of Senatorial elections, the country is divided, there has been no contest in thirteen, in all of which Zaghloulist candidates have been returned unopposed. Where there has been a fight the result will in almost every case have been the same, for it is anticipated that the Zaghloulist Party will not lose more than two or three seats at the most. Thus a Government majority is assured, without taking into consideration the 40 per cent. of nominated members who, if not all the most fervent of Zaghloulists, will most certainly none of them be open opponents of the Government. The nominations will probably be made at the end of this or the beginning of next week, and then there will remain nothing further of importance to be done before the meeting of Parliament, which looks like materialising about the third week in March.

An Historic Meeting.

Nothing of recent occurrence has more touched the imagination of the Egyptian public than the visit of the High Commissioner, made within a few hours of his return from the Sudan, to Saad Pasha Zaghloul at the Presidency of the Council of Ministers last Friday. To look back a twelvemonth, and to remember conditions as they were then and the apparent impossibility of these two men ever shaking hands in friendly encounter, is to realise the immense change which has come over Egypt in a year. There has been much loose talk in the Arabic Press and elsewhere of Viscount Allenby's preferring to resign to remaining as High Commissioner with Zaghloul Pasha as Premier. The good grace with which the High Commissioner has accepted the new order and his haste to cement the friendly relations already begun during his absence by Mr. Clark Kerr, have revealed a hitherto imperfectly realised and entirely admirable side of the great soldier's character. It seems reasonable to suppose that even did Lord Allenby feel that his work here had been consummated by the establishment of an independent constitutional government, the British Government would do all in its power to dissuade him from an intention which would necessitate horses being swapped while a part of the stream has yet to be crossed.

Germany and the Geographic Conference.

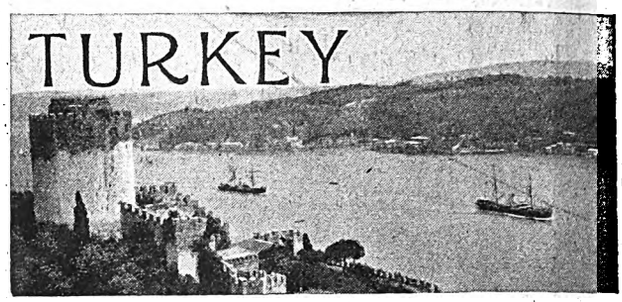
A question which originated some time ago, and has been heard of at intervals, has again come to the fore during the last few days. This is the failure on the part of the Egyptian Government to invite Germany to send representatives to the International Geographic Conference to be held here next year. The German Chargé d'affaires has been taking the matter up again with the Egyptian Foreign Ministry during the past week. It is understood that the failure to send the German Government an invitation arose out of the action of the French and Belgian Governments, who intimated that if Germany were invited they would not be represented. It is necessary to add that this explanation, though it is believed to be the correct one, was not given me by the Egyptian authorities, whom I have not yet had an opportunity of consulting in the matter.

The British Union.

Since the occurrence of the dispute—described in this correspondence—between the British Union in Egypt and the newly-formed Council of the British Community in Alexandria, little has been heard of the latter body. If it is working, it is doing so in secret. On the other hand, the British Union has been forging ahead, the New Year having brought it a considerable accession of members, many of them—and this is, naturally, particularly gratifying to the Council—residents of Alexandria.

M. Smirnoff's Death.

The passing away, on Thursday, of M. Alexis Smirnoff, who, until the Egyptian Government recently refused to recognise him, was Russian Minister for Egypt, and had been for a long time doyen of the local diplomatic corps, removed a very charming and distinguished diplomat, whose last few years were very unfortunate. Having lost all his money through the Russian revolution, he had to depend on the salary paid him by the Egyptian Government, and when this ceased he was hard put to it to live. Although his death followed on an accident in which a leg was injured, it was probably due as much to disappointment as to anything else. His funeral was an imposing affair, the Egyptian Government doing something to repair the gross discourtesy with which, a few months ago, they treated a man who had performed great services for them, as well as for the Government which he had formerly represented.



Constantinople, February 25.

Coming Changes.

Whereas last week it was possible merely to deduce from one or two comparatively trivial hints that changes in the Turkish political world were on the tapis, matters have so far developed during the past seven days that the cat is almost out of the bag, so far, at any rate, as to be sure that there is really a cat in the bag, but not quite far enough to be able to say now what colour it is. The Turkish Press, led by the Tanin, as we should have expected after Hussein Jahid's reception at Smyrna, has been daily dropping a tantalising series of inspired hints concerning the scope and nature of the coming changes; these hints are growing steadily more precise, and have doubtless been arranged "according to plan."

The manner in which the publicity campaign for the coming events has been staged makes it obvious that the new policy, whatever it may be, is the personal policy of Mustapha Kemal Pasha, and that he has taken the prominent journalists of Constantinople sufficiently into his confidence to win their support for the policy and their collaboration as fellow-conspirators in the jolly game of exciting the public curiosity. We have been allowed to know one concrete fact, namely, that the great secret will be divulged by the President himself in his speech to the Assembly on March 1 next; meanwhile the papers are going as far as they can without risking his righteous wrath for the crime of stealing his thunder. The next definite prediction that may be made is that the Ismet Cabinet will undergo a certain amount of reconstruction, and we have been told which Ministers will retire—the Ministers of Public Instruction, Justice, and National Economy, and possibly one or two others. It must, therefore, be assumed that the whole basis of the Cabinet will be broadened in order to obtain a Ministry of All the Talents, irrespective of loyalties to the various nebulous party clichés, all of which are out of date and meaningless, with the possible exception of the motto "Union and Progress."

The Unionist and the People's Parties.

The return to power of many members of the so-called Unionist Party and the final disintegration of that deliquescent organism called the People's Party are a foregone conclusion. The People's Party has never been more than a central executive committee for "rigging" elections; after that it was without form and void, because practically every member of the Assembly, whatever his views, nominally belonged to it. Its final disappearance will tend to rehabilitate the Unionist Party, because the numerous Unionists who were elected as nominal members of the People's Party will now come out in their true colours.

The suggestions of the Turkish papers as to the probable effect of the President's pronouncements on the future development of party politics are illuminating. The Tanin says textually :—

> "The People's Party will take the leaps which until now have given it pause and created the impression that it would not move resolutely forward towards the modernisation of our beloved Turkey. In future, all obstacles will be pushed aside. . . . We must, therefore, expect some resignations and readjustments in the party itself, and by that means there will be formed a strong majority resolved to support without reserve all measures destined to promote the movement in the direction of modernism and the regeneration of the whole nation."

The Khalifate.

The insistence on "modernism," the frequency with which the idea of the essentially lay character of the Turkish State is emphasised, the inspired predictions that the future developments of the internal policy of the Government will divide the country into two well-defined parties—the Liberals and the Conservatives, the recent Press offensive against the subsidies granted to the Khalif and the Princes of the ex-Imperial family—all these manifestations lead one to think that some radical decisions on the Khalifate question are about to be taken, and this opinion is fortified by the latest pronouncements to the effect that the Minister for Religion will acquire some special status, the nature of which is not defined.

The Budget.

The discussion of the Budget for the coming year has commenced in the Assembly. The final official figures for the deficit on the past year are £T8,500,000. From the opening statement on February 20 by the Minister of Finance it is not easy to get any very precise idea of the manner in which he proposes to cover last year's deficit and make provision against a similar or larger deficit in the coming year. The only brand new source of revenue which appears to be incorporated is that to be derived from a monopoly on spirituous liquors, which he estimates will produce twenty-five millions. In the present state of the administration one very much doubts it. With regard to the possibility of their having recourse to a foreign loan, there seems to be a difference of opinion between the Minister and the Budget Committee, for the former stated that the country would not need to have recourse to foreign capital loans, while the Committee in its résumé of the country's financial policy in the coming year states that they will have recourse to foreign capital.

Compulsory Rest on Friday.

In Constantinople the condition of progressive stagnation continues, if such a contradiction in terms can be tolerated. The weekly rest day last Friday was somewhat less rigorous, although with a perfect genius for making life as complicated and uncomfortable as possible the authorities had insisted upon depriving us of the use of our motor-cars, unless we had got a special permit for taking the air on that day. The real "grouse" on this subject came, however, from the merchants who sell bibelots, souvenirs, and "antiquities" in the Stamboul bazaar and elsewhere, for the fates had ordained that last Friday there should be two huge Transatlantic liners in the port with about a thousand American tourists. Notwithstanding S.O.S. calls to Angora for permission to open the bazaar for the amusement of the tourists and the enrichment of the shopkeepers, the bazaar remained closed, also all the shops in Pera, and nothing was left for the visitors during their few hours ashore but to have lunch at Tokatlian's Hotel and to wander round in long streams of decrepit gharries to see the sights through streets that resembled nothing so much as the East End of London on a Sunday morning. There are much wailing and gnashing of teeth at the loss of the good piastres, and, without holding a brief for the commercial morality of the bazaar wallah or the quality of his wares, one must confess to feeling considerable sympathy with him and, incidentally, with the American visitors.

THE MACEDONIAN PROBLEM.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—The report of the proceedings of the Near and Middle East Association, published in THE NEAR EAST on January 31 last, has been the cause of several questions in the House of Commons as to the alleged statement of the present Secretary of State for Air on the subject of Macedonia.

The Lord Privy Seal having since declared in the House of Commons that "the statement was inaccurately reported," and that, "moreover, the meeting at which it was alleged to have been made was intended to be of a private nature," would it be possible—in view, first, of the privacy of the meeting, and, secondly, of the inaccuracy of the statement—for you to explain the source of your information?—I am, etc.,

AN APPEAL FOR THE ASSYRIANS.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—In the name of the Almighty God, we are calling your attention to the most unspeakably miserable condition of the homeless noble Christian Syrians who, in the Great War, threw in their lot with the Allies. They destroyed five Turkish Divisions in fourteen battles, and were recognised by Great Britain as staunch allies.

Owing to political difficulties, this brave Christian nation are to-day homeless, the population having been depleted by half. Unless we can help them, the remainder must be left among their war enemies, Turks, Kurds, and Arabs, which will probably result in wholesale massacre.

We have now found a way to save this intelligent race and make them happy. There are good lands in the South of France where the climate and fruits are the same as in their own country. A family could live on five acres, which can be bought at the present time for £25. We are earnestly asking kind-hearted friends to help us; information may be had from Miss Barclay (founder of the Nestorian Mission), "Urie," Tranton Road, London, S.E.16.—I am, etc.,

AGHA PETROS,
Commander-in-Chief of the Assyrian Forces.

A strong earth tremor was experienced throughout Galilee on February 27 at 10.30 p.m., lasting three minutes. No damage is regorted.

PRESS ON THE NEAR EAST.

The Sudan.

In an article contained in the Daily News of February 28 "T. N. K." writes upon the future of the Sudan. He begins by examining the considerations that will influence the attitude of the British Government in regard to the claim of Zaghloul Pasha to the complete and absolute independence of Egypt and the Sudan, and says bluntly :—

> The Sudan is not, and never has been, an integral part of Egypt. It lies much further south, is separated from Upper Egypt by a trackless desert, and between Assouan and Wadi Halfa is connected solely by the River Nile. South of Halfa to Khartoum communication is maintained by the railway which was constructed originally by Lord Kitchener during the Omdurman campaign. Regionally, therefore, Egypt and the Sudan are places apart. This divergence extends to the inhabitants. The Egyptians, mainly that by descent, are brownish-white in colour; the Sudanese, a sturdy negroid race, coal black, with curly hair. This difference in appearance is natural, not artificial.

It is foolish, he continues, for any Egyptian to speak of the Sudan and Egypt as one country, and points out the well-known fact that :—

> The fundamental difference between even the administration of Egypt and the Sudan is clearly shown by the fact that the Egyptian Civil Service is a different body to the Sudan Civil Service. In no country, it may be added, has British direction been so conspicuously successful, and no unbiased visitor to the Sudan could fail to perceive the high prestige of the British official contrasted with the unpopularity of his Egyptian confrère. In the Army especially it is notorious that Sudanese soldiers will not serve under Egyptian officers, so intense is the antipathy between the two races.
> Under these circumstances one feels justified in querying both the justice and the wisdom of Zaghloul's claim of complete independence for the Sudan—the justice because Egypt's only claim to the Sudan is the right of conquest; and the wisdom, because if Zaghloul receives British agreement to his demands, the Sudanese will still have to be reckoned with.

This last point, that of Sudanese opinion upon the claim of the Egyptian Government, he develops thus :—

> Suppose that the Sudanese consider that the solicitude of the Egyptians for Sudanese independence is only another way of expressing solicitude for the Nile water, so essential to Egyptian prosperity, and that when Saad Zaghloul talks of Sudanese independence he really means Egyptian control of the head waters of the Nile, even at the cost of Sudanese development. Suppose that the Sudanese, swayed by such considerations as these, decline to accept their independence, will Zaghloul insist on their taking it? Will he impose independence on the Sudan by force of arms? Old soldiers who have fought with and against both races smile at this suggestion. They know that in that case there would be but one ending, and that ending not the ending desired by the Egyptians.

And his conclusion is that "if Egypt has a claim to independence she must make her claim independently of the Sudan."

The Near East.

The Constantinople correspondent of the Glasgow Herald, writing in the issue of February 27, says that diplomacy has again become fashionable in the Near East. After detailing the six alliances or understandings that have been formed since the War, he comes to the Italo-Yugoslav Agreement, which he thinks will be of "great value for the cause of peace in the Near East" :—

> This agreement has at last made friendship and good political and economic relations possible between the two neighbouring countries. This is an unexpectedly fortunate result, clearing away the fear of a war between Serbia and Italy, which at the accession of M. Mussolini to power seemed almost inevitable. Feeling now secure on her southern border, Serbia and the Little Entente will become stronger and better able to watch, in conjunction with France, what is going on in the North. But Italy, having concluded a compromise in the Adriatic, becomes free to pursue her Mediterranean policy with greater energy, and, as it appears, not always in the same direction with France. And thus the storm-centre of the world may be said to have moved west. Small causes for war are disappearing in the Near East, thanks to the abovementioned treaties and agreements, and trade in the Near East, and with it, will certainly profit even by this limited but assured appeasement.

LORD ROBERTS' YOUTH.

"LETTERS WRITTEN DURING THE INDIAN MUTINY." By Fred Roberts, afterwards Field-Marshal Earl Roberts, V.C., K.G. With a Preface by his daughter, Countess Roberts. (London: Macmillan. 10s. 6d. net.)

It may be thought, perhaps, by some that the publication of letters written in his youth, even by one who, like Lord Roberts, afterwards attained such celebrity and distinction, about the events of a period more than half a century ago, will serve now no useful purpose. But this would be a mistake. A perusal of the letters shows very clearly what force of character and push, coupled with an intense patriotism, in a young man can do to secure not only his own advancement, but the good of his country. From the very beginning, when young Roberts started on his career, he was possessed with the determination of seeing active service as soon as possible and of taking advantage of every opportunity; and certainly he made the most of his chances, succeeding in obtaining an important staff appointment whilst on active service, and, above all, the coveted V.C. for conspicuous gallantry in the field, as well as frequent mentions in despatches. Apart from their value as a character sketch, the letters are intensely interesting as containing first-hand information about the Indian Mutiny and the great deeds of John Nicholson and others. Lord Roberts' own services are mentioned only en passant, his idea being evidently to describe the exploits of others rather than his own. The letters occasionally give us rather more detail than the portion dealing with the Mutiny in "Forty-one Years in India"—e.g., the story of Lieutenant Delafosse about the Cawnpore massacres. It is possible, however, that the writer may have preferred in after years not to dwell too long on the horrors of the Cawnpore and Delhi massacres in the hope that the "dead past might bury its dead," and that people's thoughts might be turned rather to the future of India and to guarding against the mistakes some of which had been amongst the prime causes of the Mutiny.

These letters of a young man to his father, mother, and sister are most charming reading, and when it is remembered that many of them were written probably under fire we admire them still more. Take, for instance, the following extract from a letter to his mother:—

"This is my 25th birthday. I am sure you are thinking of me. How can I ever thank you for all you have done? But for your kind care and affection, I should never have got on, and I can well remember what trouble I used to give you; but you must not think of that, mother, now, only of my love and extreme gratitude to you. My chief pleasure in doing well is knowing that it will make you and the General proud and happy."

Lucky parents, indeed, to have had such a son. An interesting preface and some illuminating footnotes have been provided by the editor, Countess Roberts, and there are some reproductions of portraits of Lord Roberts at the age of 20, of General Abraham Roberts, Mrs. Roberts, and Harriet Roberts. The book has been very well equipped and produced by Messrs. Macmillan and Co.

PERSIAN STORIES.

"'THE THREE DERVISHES,' AND OTHER PERSIAN TALES AND LEGENDS." Translated by Reuben Levy. (Humphrey Milford: Oxford University Press. 2s.)

A great multitude of grateful men, women, and children will bless Professor Levy for his labour of love in seeking out, choosing, and translating so pleasantly these perfectly delightful and satisfactory tales. Why such stories have not been made available to the public before it seems difficult to understand. They are of the "Arabian Nights" type, but are purely Persian, while the collection we all know so well seems to be due to Persian genius after domestication in Baghdad. There is a very special charm attached to the pure vintage. Here, for instance, is the ending to the story of "The Palace of the Nine Pavilions," in itself a title of promise well carried out:—

> "For forty years Shirzad reigned in all prosperity. Then one day the desire possessed him to hunt again in the forest. Taking a company of nobles with him, he rode out. No sooner had he entered the trees than a lion sprang upon Shirzad, tore him from his horse, and bore him away. The king did not fear, for he knew the ways of lions, and in a little while he seated himself upon the lion's back, took it by the ears and led it among the trees. His attendants lost sight of him, and though they sought everywhere no trace of him was ever found again. Gulshad (his queen), in great sorrow, mourned for him continually, and at last in deepest despair went up to the topmost tower of her castle with the intention of throwing herself to the ground. But as she leapt the wind caught her and carried her away, and no man knows whither she went."

Almost all of the tales have been translated from manuscript originals in the Bodleian, which have so far never been published. There must be many more where these come from, and we put it to Professor Levy that it is his clear duty to set to work and give us more and yet more of them.

While thanking him, let us not forget the obligation we are under to the publisher, Mr. Humphrey Milford, for making over the book to the public in the "World's Classics" series, well printed and "got up," and all for the sum of two shillings. Let us hope that the partnership will be continued, and soon.

BRITAIN AND TURKEY.

Lord Curzon on the New Regime.

In the debate in the House of Lords on February 28 upon the Treaty of Peace (Turkey) Bill, Lord Curzon, after outlining the broad features of the Treaty signed with the Turks at Lausanne and pointing out that no attacks had been made on the Treaty by any responsible person, said :—

There are certain aspects of Turkish policy, as we saw at Lausanne, and as we continue to see now, which I deeply deplore. I think the policy upon which they have embarked of driving out Greeks and Armenians from their territories, and requiring the forcible repatriation of Moslems outside their territories, is a policy of political folly and of economic madness. I am certain it will break down. It has already begun to break down. Turkey is not in a condition to lead a purely self-sufficing existence, and she will find, as she goes along, that she will want the assistance of these very useful and laborious natives in the future just as she has done in the past.

Another point on which I think she is very ill advised indeed is in the idea that she can get along without the financial and economic assistance of Europe. Of course, she cannot. At Constantinople, at Smyrna, and everywhere else, European commerce and European traders and concessionaires are absolutely vital to enable her to run the machine, and if they are to be asked to live and trade there they must be given the elements of fair and sound judicial administration. There, again, we are passing through a period of trial, but I have no doubt that the present xenophobia of Turkey, the present rather exaggerated and flamboyant spirit of nationalism of Turkey, will again subside, and we shall revert to a better position of affairs.

They are confronted at the present moment with the difficulty of balancing the Budget, of repressing the brigandage which is very prevalent all over Anatolia, and of developing their resources. They have chosen to do it in their own way. What should our attitude be? I do not think it is the least good to harp on the memories or revive the animosities of the past. Let us pass the sponge over the slate. If Turkey chooses, in the recovery of her sovereignty and independence, which not only have we not challenged but assisted to recreate ourselves; if she chooses, in the pursuance of that policy and that ideal, to commit mistakes, she will be the sufferer by them and for them. But let us, within the measure of our capacity, realising the tremendous difficulty of her task, give her where we can and in what measure we can the kind of assistance that Europe, and notably this country, gave to Japan sixty or seventy years ago when she emerged from conditions that were almost feudal in their character, and in order to attain her great position in the world was wise enough to rely on the advice and the resources of Europe. If Turkey shows an inclination to turn to us for such assistance, I am sure we shall be willing to give it.

This peace Treaty, which I conclude by recommending to your Lordships, is one which, if it does not give complete satisfaction to anybody, has given, I think, absolutely unmitigated relief to all. It is the last of the Peace Treaties. It shuts the door; we are no longer at war. We have been able to take our troops from Constantinople. We have sent a Chargé d'Affaires to Constantinople, and there is now a Turkish representative in London whom the noble and learned Lord can see at the Foreign Office whenever he likes. The sky is for the moment clear, at any rate as regards international relations between us. And here I say, not without a touch of pride, that I believe at this moment if there is a country that stands high in the regard and esteem of Turkey it is this country. I challenge contradiction on that point; and if that be so, let us, instead of diving again into the troubles and anxieties of the past, devote ourselves with as much devotion and sincerity as we can to assist our old friend Turkey and our former Ally Turkey in the difficult future that lies before her.

ROUMANIAN LECTURES.

Under the auspices of the Department of Roumania, University of London, King's College, a course of three public lectures will be delivered on March 6, 13, and 20, at 5.30 p.m. each. The first, on "The Legend of Balaam and Josaphat in Roumanian Literature," will be given by M. Gaster, Ph.D.; the second, on "Foreign Influences in the Growth of Roumania," by D. Mitrany, B.A.; and the third, on "Pagan Remnants in Roumanian Folklore," by M. Beza.

THE JERUSALEM UNIVERSITY.

The Hebrew University Committee attached to the Zionist Executive in London have acquired the famous Oriental library of the late Professor Ignaz Goldziher, of Budapest, for the Jewish National and University Library in Jerusalem. The negotiations, which were begun some months ago, were completed recently by Mr. Israel Cohen, who went to Budapest for the purpose of obtaining the permission of the Hungarian Government for the exportation of the library and who was greatly assisted by the British Legation. The collection, which comprises 6,000 volumes, is being shipped from Trieste to Palestine.

The Goldziher library is probably the most remarkable private collection of Oriental works in the world, and was accumulated during a lifetime from all parts of the East. It comprises all branches of Semitic studies in the various Oriental languages, the Arabic and Islamic world being particularly well represented. There are many rare Arabic, Persian, and Turkish prints, some of which are the only copies that ever reached Europe, whilst every distinguished Orientalist of the last half-century is represented by presentation works. Particular value attaches to the voluminous annotations by Professor Goldziher in a great number of books. Besides the purely Oriental section the Library also includes a collection of Hebrew and Biblical literature and of the works of modern Jewish scholarship. Its transference to Jerusalem will very considerably enhance the importance of the Jewish National Library to all students of Oriental lore.

A MESSAGE FROM CYPRUS.

We have received the following telegram from the Greek Press Bureau at Limassol :—

The Cyprus Church and people submitted, through the National Council, a memorial to the Home Government expressing the conviction that the Labour Government will do justice to Cyprus. The memorial points out that the will of Cyprus to union with the Motherland is unaltered, and if immediate union presents difficulties, it claims a Constitution making Cyprus mistress in her own house. It considers the condition of the people without precedent, and the present generation appeals to the principles of Labour, and reminds Mr. Ramsay MacDonald of the declarations regarding Cyprus at the Socialist Conference at Berne in February, 1919. The Press announces meetings and ceremonies to be held in connection with the hundredth anniversary of the death of Lord Byron.

The Emir Ali, the eldest son of King Hussein of the Hejaz, has arrived at Jerusalem from Transjordania.

It is stated that the Belgrade Skupshtina has ratified the Convention with Greece according Yugoslavia a free zone at Salonika, 142 Deputies voting for ratification and none against it.

It is generally thought that the Turkish representative for the Mosul negotiations, which are expected to begin at Constantinople shortly, will be either General Ismet Pasha or, more probably, Riza Nur Bey.

Cardinal Bourne and his fellow pilgrims arrived at Jerusalem on February 29. The Cardinal was met at the Jaffa Gate by a representative of the High Commissioner, the Governor, and ecclesiastical dignitaries, and proceeded on foot to the Patriarchate.

OTHMAN AND KEMAL.

There would seem to be little doubt that Mustapha Kemal Pasha has now reached the climax of his career, and that the long struggle against the House of Othman—for that has been the dominant factor of Turkish domestic politics of the last two years—is now at an end. We write before the definitive issue of Mustapha Kemal's speech to the Angora Assembly on this question of the Khalifate is known, but everything is pointing to the fact that the day of the Othman dynasty is over. The House of Kemal has definitely triumphed; it has laid in the dust the House which, four centuries ago, seized the powers of Sultan-Khalif. In this passing of the ancient House of Othman the Turk of to-day, we must suppose, finds no cause for tears. From his point of view, indeed, its disappearance will come as a relief, although he had looked upon it as a foregone conclusion ever since the abolition of the Sultanate in 1922. The powers which were then preserved for the Khalifate have not, the Republican Turk is convinced, been used for the advancement of his State, and, having thus failed in the one thing that now matters, the Khalif can be dispensed with. Nothing in Turkey was strong enough to stop the Republicans' leading of events, and so, sadly and with the inevitable but pitiably impotent expression of the non-recognition of the present state of affairs, Abdul Mejid follows Wahid-ed-Din, and the family of Othman slips out of Turkish history. Whether the departure that is thus enforced is deserved it is not for the non-Moslem to say; he can merely remember the fact that the treason trials that were fought round the Khalifate recently failed entirely to prove that the Khalif had been acting contrary to the best interests of the Turkish State, and he will, therefore be inclined to think that this decision to expel the family of Othman must be due to some bigger, or else to some more personal cause.

Whatever be the explanation of Angora's treatment of the Khalifate, it will at least help to clear the air in Turkey. In the assumption that it was rather particular anxiety for the immediate welfare of the Republic than general fear for the condition of Islam that prompted the Nationalists to this move, we are justified now in judging the Administration more keenly than hitherto. There is now in Turkey no institution nor person that can reasonably be put down as an obstacle to the progress of the Republic; to all appearances, the Ghazi has an absolutely clear road before him. He can safely concentrate on the material, which modern Turkey thinks is the real, side of things—the spiritual side can look after itself In any case, it is argued in Anatolia, with all the passion for being up-to-date, the care of men's souls is not the affair of the State, but rather of the religious world to which the man belongs. It is difficult not to feel a certain sympathy for Angora in the dilemma in which it found itself, with the temporal power of the new capital so little in concordance with the spiritual power at the old capital; all men's natures are dual, and in experiencing the pull between the conservative instinct and the desire for progress, the Nationalists in the Turkish capital were faced with a problem that has confronted many other more advanced States. These Nationalists have shaken the dust of centuries off a good many Turkish institutions, and if they can harness, or have already harnessed, a long view to their admirable driving powers, they may make permanent, or reasonably permanent, the very considerable changes that they have enforced. There are, it is true, not wanting those who say that these changes in Turkey are the work of one man, on whose death matters will revert to the old state, and, comparing the Turkish President to the Fascist leader in Italy, or to the Sardar Sepah in Persia, assert that when Mustapha Kemal is gone the work that has been accomplished under his ægis will quickly fall to pieces. However that may be, there is no gainsaying the remarkable nature of his performance. He has stepped, or, rather, jumped, from success to success, and this, the practical abolition of the Khalifate, is his crowning achievement. The act of Sultan Selim in the sixteenth century now becomes merely a notable historical phenomenon, and one would not have thought that it could so rapidly have lost all living significance. The Ghazi's hand in working up the agitation against the Khalifate proved even more crafty than was previously recognised.

How will this banishment of the House of Othman affect the Moslem world? It is, of course, the Sunnis' own matter, but in their reception of it Great Britain, who is responsible for considerably more than half of them, must necessarily be keenly interested. If one may infer from the fact that the powers seized by the Othman family in the sixteenth century conferred on that family a title the legitimacy of which has never since been disputed, that the Moslem world always accepts the fait accompli, one may hope that there will be no quarrelling in Islam. In India, to judge by the anxiety over the question of the Khalif's temporal powers and of his dignity as manifested (and underrated) in the recent letter of the Aga Khan and of Mr. Ameer Ali to Angora, the depositing of the Khalif's powers either in the Grand National Assembly or in a religious representative named by the Assembly should be welcomed, for no Khalif in Islam could command such powers as one possessed of the Assembly's backing. But, on the other hand, the purely practical manner of Abdul Mejid's deposition may give a lead to those Moslems who have for some time been either opposed to the policy of Angora or else have been named publicly as possible claimants to the Khalifate. First of all, of course, there springs to the mind the name of King Hussein of the Hejaz, who, rightly or wrongly, has been persistently credited with designs to the title of "Commander of the Faithful." It is a mistake, we think, to imagine that his religious aspirations are in excess of his political hopes, but developments may be certainly looked for in that quarter. There is, again, the Ameer of Afghanistan, whose claims, although of short existence, have considerable weight. Others who may be mentioned as possible Khalifs include the Sultan of Morocco, the head of the Senussi, and King Fuad of Egypt. For various reasons it may be supposed that none of these last named will take seriously the candidature to the Khalifate which has been attributed to them, and if a rival Khalif to Angora's nominee is created, he may well come from some source not at the moment in the eye of the public. Presumably, however, the experiment of endeavouring to persuade Orientals to revere an institution rather than a man will be made, at least, for a time, and it would be gratuitous to speculate upon its chances of success. Non-Moslems will do little good by harping on the internal divisions of Islam, and it has to be remembered, after all, that the real thing that binds the followers of the Prophet together is not the institution of the Khalifate, but the Haj.

THE BUKOVINA: LAND OF BEECHES.

BY E. C. DAVIES.

To appreciate to the full the beauty of the "land of beeches" and its simple, unspoiled people one must leave the towns behind—even that charming one of Cernauti, and journey to some of the lovely villages among the forests which clothe the mountain sides of the Bukovina, fairest of all Roumanian provinces.

Here the peasant of the finest type lives out his laborious but happy life, untouched by the clamour of cities, dignified, simple, and hospitable, like all mountain folk.

You may meet him on Sundays, clad in long white woollen coat and leather top-boots, coming into the towns with his load of wood, stopping to say a prayer in one of the churches, drinking a glass of brandy in one of the humbler cafés; but to know him at his best you must climb with him the steep slopes of those magnificent beech forests which have given their name to this lovely land, or see him in festival dress against the background of a fourteenth century monastery, or float with him down the Bistritza on one of the rough rafts he has constructed from the great logs.

And whether you travel north or south, from Suceava to Radauti, or beyond, he is the same—forester or raftsman, shepherd of the highlands or field worker of the plains—passionately proud of the history and traditions of his country, intelligent and active, and so tenacious of ancient custom that to-day, as in the days of Stephen the Great, he wears his hair shoulder length and would scorn to cut it shorter, for such was the tradition of the country, not lightly to be broken. All over Roumania, from the borders of Transylvania to the east of Bessarabia, you will find the same songs and hear the same legends. Watch the traditional hora danced on a hundred village greens and observe the same charming feeling for colour and costume, differing with localities, but so essentially Roumanian as never to be mistaken for that of any other land.

An unforgettable memory, lingering vividly in the mind, is that of a group of Bukovinian peasants assembled for one of the festivals with which the Greek Church is pleasantly profuse around the ancient walls of the monastery of Suczavica, itself one of the beauty spots of the Bukovina. The day was hot, the sun blazing in a clear sky intensely blue, against which the graceful roofs of the old church were sharply silhouetted. On the steps of the porch, with its wonderful frescoes, some half obliterated by the passage of time, others as fresh as though painted yesterday, rested a group of peasants. The women's fine white lawn robes served as a foil for their delicately hued embroidery and the glitter of coloured sequins; they wore their loveliest "fotas," the tight double aprons of the province, and their most charming headdresses of lace and lawn.

Every man had a magnificent leather waistcoat, some fur-edged, all bright with silk embroidery and multi-coloured leather ornaments, with long white woollen trousers tucked into high boots or worn with the thonged sandals common to all Eastern Europe, spotless linen shirts again serving as background for the exquisite needlework of the Roumanian woman.

Since daybreak a long line of the creaking country carts drawn by great dun-coloured oxen had made their way along the dusty roads, bringing in these handsome peasants, with their grave classic features and lustrous dark eyes to celebrate their Saints' festival. The old church is modelled after the traditions of Mount Athos, its round windows raining sunlight into the inner darkness, glowing like a jewel under the dazzling brightness of that summer noon. The sixteenth century frescoes are the admiration of connoisseurs, covering the whole of the outer surface, they contain hundreds of figures, painted in soft reds and blues, purples and gold, against a background of rich green. An indefatigable piety has created these many coloured crowned and haloed saints, these towns and churches which frame the figures in the pictured scenes.

Against the white church with its garland of colour these shifting groups of peasants, the white of their robes and the long woollen cloaks which hang picturesquely from the shoulders of the older men contrasting vividly with the colours of aprons and waistcoats, the sparkling of gold and silver ornaments, the glitter of sequins, the pearls which shimmer on the antique belt clasps, form a wonderful symphony of light and brilliancy which baffle description.

The peasants' joys are very simple; these festivals of the church, where neighbour meets neighbour from across the mountain, forming almost the only break in the monotony of toil. The decorous holiday crowds sit on the grass to discuss the simple fare brought from home and supplemented by the bread and soup which the priests of the monastery distribute from a primitive shelter, draw water from the well near the church; and, the service and the meal over, the elders form a circle round the green, where the young men and girls join hands and tread the measures of the national hora. Pipe and fiddle make gay music; the dignified old men, their long waving hair under the round black hat of the mountains giving them a patriarchal look, watch the dancers, smoking meanwhile a meditative pipe, while the mothers, as mothers will the world over, smile proudly at handsome lad or lovely daughter, who now represent them in the eternal pageant of youth.

THE WORLD OF ISLAM.

Under the presidency of Earl Winterton, Sir Thomas Arnold lectured to the Northbrook Society on February 22 upon "Some Aspects of Islam." He said that, whether we liked it or not, we had now to live with the world of Islam. The world itself had in recent years so shrunk that it would for ever be impossible, as formerly, to treat Islam as something remote and not vitally affecting us. The effect of the steamship, the railway, the aeroplane, wireless, and so on had been cumulative, so that it might now be said that we had reached a very definite parting of the ways. It was a mistake to suppose that the East was incapable of understanding the discoveries in science of the West; there were men in the Mohammedan world perfectly capable of comprehending the most abstruse Western thought. The influence of the Press in Islam had been enormous, and those Moslems who had been educated on Western lines understood well the power of the Press. All that was said by important people in the West upon the subject of Islam was very soon afterwards reproduced in Arabic, Persian, Turkish, or in Hindustani. He well remembered the effect that a tactless speech upon Islam by the Bishop of London in the Albert Hall a few years ago had upon the Moslem world very shortly after it was uttered.

The importance of the subject of Islam to this country was, of course, immense. Out of the 228 millions of Mussulmans in the world, there were only 33 millions not under European control; over 100 millions were under British control. In Algeria, in Egypt, and in Turkey the Moslems had been subject for the most part to French influence; in India, to British; in Java, to Dutch; and in Russia, to Russian influence. It was, incidentally, a great pity that so few of us understood Russian, for the workings of the Russian thought upon the Moslem mind had produced most interesting results.

Sir Thomas reminded his audience that Islam was not only a religion; it was also a civilisation. It not only directed a man's theology; it formed his society. So great was its civilising influence, indeed, that a notable Moslem had once said that if he did not believe in a God he should still believe that Mohammed was his Prophet. But, in fact, it was the old civilisation of the Roman Empire that Islam carried on; it was the continuation of Hellenism. This was the work of the Arabs in the seventh century, as it was the work of the Turks in the fourteenth century. Islam was, therefore, not remote from Christianity; it was closely allied to it. At first, indeed, it had been treated by Christian writers—e.g., St. John of Damascus—as a mere heresy; and even up to the time of the Renaissance it was possible to hear Christians speak of the followers of Islam as Mohammedan Christians. The fact alone of the revelation of the one God should be a sufficient basis for the Christian and the Moslem religions to understand one another.

The concluding part of his lecture Sir Thomas devoted to showing how and on what grounds Westerns and Moslems can approach each other. He submitted that to every Western the cultured Mohammedan has at least three qualities that exercise a powerful attraction: First, was the dignity of the Mussulman under all the blows of Fate; in his submission to the dictates of Allah he possessed a composure equal to that of any human being on earth. Next was the Moslem's discovery to the world of the true status of trade. Trade in the West had, until recently, at any rate, been contemned; but the Prophet himself had engaged in trade, and had in fact said that traders should in Paradise be next to those who had died in Jehad. And, finally, Westerns could find sympathy with Islam in the mysticism which was one of its chiefest glories. In mysticism rival faiths could draw closely together, and Islamic mystics showed as much toleration, depth, and loftiness of thought as could anywhere be found.

In passing a vote of thanks to the lecturer, Earl Winterton referred to his impressions of Islam, through visits to such places as Egypt, the Sudan, Turkey, Arabia, and India. He was convinced of the accuracy of the assertion that Islam was a continuation of Hellenism. In Arabia (Northern Hejaz) he had seen physical traces of Roman remains. Further, he emphasised the importance of the study in this country of Islamic institutions. Our educators knew all about Rome and Greece, but of older civilisations, or of civilisations that had grown out of the Hellenic civilisations, they knew nothing. British ignorance of Islam was deplorable.

PALESTINE MILITARY COMMAND.

The Palestine Government announces officially that Major-General Tudor has resigned the Military Command in Palestine. It is further stated that from April of this year the post of Military Commander in Palestine will be abolished. The British forces in the country will from that date be placed under the command of Air-Commodore Gerrard.

A LEAGUE OF NATIONS MEETING.

A well-attended meeting took place at Beaulieu on February 28, under the patronage of Field-Marshal His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught, the Bishop of Gibraltar being in the chair, to listen to an address on the League of Nations. The Bishop introduced the lecturer, Mr. Frederick Whelen, in a short speech, in which he spoke of those defeatists who are always croaking about the League, saying it is a body of idyllists merely and serving no practical purpose. The lecturer commenced by saying that the first part of the Treaty of Versailles deals specially with the League, and that all the signatory Powers to that Treaty should be members of the League; indeed, at the present time fifty-four nations are members, and another Power, Turkey, is likely to join the League this year. He said that America is " a very sad exception," having failed to come in, but she had representatives on some of the League's Committees. The speaker went on to recite some of the League's achievements, notably the great work of Dr. Nansen in securing the release of the prisoners of war from Russia; the work of the League in helping to fight the terrible scourge of typhus in Russia, and some adjoining countries, since the War; the labours of the League to secure transport for the refugees of General Wrangel's army, which were successful; the aid secured by the League for the refugees in Greece after the Græco-Turkish War, and the work of the League in helping to save Austria from the same financial chaos which overtook Germany, and specially the part played by the League's Austrian Committee. Mr. Whelen gave further instances of the League's part as peacemaker in Europe—e.g., in the dispute between Sweden and Finland.

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London, W.C.2,
Tuesday Morning.

The Budget.

It will not be long now before we know what surprises, if any, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has in store for us. Personally, I am not looking for any great boon. The failure to make any marked reduction in the income-tax last year came as a distinct shock to many who had been expecting the same decrease as in the previous year. If it was impossible then (a dictum with which I am not prepared to agree), it is certainly no more feasible now. We have, of course, yet to see a post-War Government that really understands the need and scope for economy—the present Administration has been in office too short a time for it to be possible to tell whether in this respect it will be an improvement on its predecessors—and it was really the main ground of criticism against the late Government that they toyed with the idea of economy. It seems quite probable that the coming Budget will disclose a few reductions in duties, presumably in the direction of a freer breakfast-table, but that is not what the business community wants. All taxes are admittedly far too high, but those that, in the general interest, should first receive attention are not the duties on articles of food. Unfortunately, in these matters the political aspect and the business point of view rarely coincide.

Indian Finances.

This year's Indian Budget may fitly be regarded as a landmark in the post-War financial history of that great Empire, not because it contains any striking features (it is, as a matter of fact, devoid of anything of the kind), but because it signalises an important stage on the way to financial recovery. The Finance Member, Sir Basil Blackett, whose second Budget it is, was able to announce that the past year had ended with a deficit smaller by 2½ crores of rupees than he had anticipated. Actually, the revised estimates show at present a deficit of 38 lakhs of rupees on the ordinary account; but Sir Basil stated that it was doubtful whether there would be actually a real deficit or a small surplus. If the former should prove to be the case, Sir Basil will still be in the satisfactory position of being able to balance his first Budget, owing to an opportune windfall in the shape of about £3,250,000 which represents the profits accruing to India from the control of enemy ships. Of this amount £1,625,000 is to be transferred to revenue and the remainder is to be utilised to meet exceptional expenditure during the current year.

The Indian Outlook.

As regards trade conditions, the Finance Member pointed out that the year had been one of fairly steady but difficult trade, and that the prospect is that the visible balance of trade in favour of India will almost reach a record. He laid stress on the improvement in the financial position. The Treasury Bills in the hands of the public have been reduced from 22 crores to about 2 crores, while a large reserve has been built up in London against the sterling needs of the Government in 1924-5. It is hoped that the capital requirements of the Government of India in the coming year will be met without an external loan, and that the demands of the Government for new capital in India will be limited to a rupee loan of not more than 20 crores. For the purpose of Budget calculations, Sir Basil has taken the rupee exchange at 1s. 4¾d., but it is emphasised that this is not to be taken as prophetical. The expenditure in 1924-5 is estimated at Rs.104,57 crores, while the revenue on the existing basis of taxation is estimated at Rs.107,93 crores. It is proposed to utilise Rs.1,82 crores of the surplus to bring the salt tax down to Rs. 2 per maund, and to allocate Rs.150 lakhs to the reduction of provincial contributions.

British Trade Corporation.

At the general meeting of the British Trade Corporation last week the chairman, Lord Faringdon, threw an interesting light on the general position of the undertaking. He drew attention to the liquid character of the assets of the corporation, and went on to point out that the principal part of the item "interests in subsidiary companies" consisted of the holding in the Trade Indemnity Company. The corporation's interest in the new capital of the Levant Company is shown under the heading of "investments," which stand at £254,500. The new capital provided for this company has only been available since August, and it is interesting to note that up to December 31 a small profit was made, after providing adequate reserves for contingencies. Some progress has been made by the corporation's branches at Danzig, Belgrade, and Zagreb, and, as regards Yugoslavia, the chairman said that every effort is being made by the Government to put the country's finances on a satisfactory footing. He stated that he could give the shareholders little information about Turkey. He pointed out, however, that the ratification of the Lausanne Treaty is expected shortly, and it is hoped that there will then be a straightening out of many problems.

Bulgarian Debt Negotiations.

A temporary arrangement was reached in 1921 between the Bulgarian Government and the British and French holders of Bulgarian securities for the payment of coupons and drawn bonds in French francs. The end of this month will see the expiration of this agreement, and some little time ago a Bulgarian financial delegation arrived in Paris to conclude a new understanding on the subject. The Paris negotiations are understood to have proceeded smoothly, but nothing definite has been settled, and the delegation is now in London negotiating with representatives of the British bondholders. It goes without saying that the depreciation of the French exchange has materially altered the position, and the question at issue is to find some other currency which will be acceptable as a medium for payment. The 1921 agreement was recognised as representing the utmost that could be expected at the time and it is to be presumed that the solution will be to translate into terms of some other currency the rate of payment then agreed upon in French francs.

The Albanian Budget.

The details given in the latest report of the Financial Adviser to the Albanian Government to the Council of the League of Nations makes clear the very difficult financial position of that country at the present time. The current year's Budget is expected to show a deficit of 9,000,000 gold francs, the expenditure being estimated at 24,000,000 gold francs, against an estimated revenue of 15,000,000. The proposals to meet this deficit include further economies in administration, including a drastic curtailment of staff and increased taxation. It is recognised, however, that the whole of the deficit cannot be covered by these means.

Ottoman Railway Debenture Scheme.

So as to permit of the immediate resumption of cash payments to debenture holders, a new scheme has been put forward by the Council of the Ottoman Railway from Smyrna ot Aidin, full details of which will be found on another page in this issue. The interest on the debenture stock down to January 1, 1918, was met, it will be recalled, by issues of stock, and since that date the accumulated arrears on the 4 per cent. first debenture stock and the 5 per cent. second debenture stock amount respectively to £668,997 and £601,623. It is now proposed to cancel the six years' interest and interest thereon to July 1, 1924, and it is further proposed to pay interest without interest thereon on the stocks of both classes of debentures for the six months ended June 30, 1918, in cash as soon as may be after July 1, 1924. As from that date the distinction between the stock of each class will disappear, and the debenture debt will consist of £2,364,105 first debenture stock and £1,729,567 second debenture stock. The interest on the former will be increased to 5 per cent., while the interest on the latter will be raised to 6 per cent. Provision is also made for the merging of the present debenture stock reserve fund in a new reserve fund of £200,000. The scheme will now be submitted to the shareholders.

Imperial Wireless.

The report of the Imperial Wireless Telegraphy Committee appointed by the new Government has now been issued. It is in every sense a notable document, and if the Committee have done their work with unprecedented speed it has certainly not suffered on that account, and the recommendations they make, if adopted, as they most probably will be, will pave the way to the adequate development of this means of communication. Wireless is still in its infancy, but already some remarkable things have been accomplished through its agency, and it needs no special powers of prevision to foresee the day when wireless has brought continents as close together as villages are now. Its importance to the Empire is at once obvious and unique. The far-flung character of the Empire carries with it certain elements of weakness, and the great development of wireless should go far to remedy this, if not entirely to remove it.

Palestine's Trade in 1923.

The statistics are now available of the trade of Palestine in 1923. The imports, including imports in transit to Syria, amounted in value to £E5,124,945, while the exports, including exports in transit from Syria, amounted in value to £E1,100,337. There was thus a very large adverse trade balance. Great Britain takes first place in the import list, with £E1,123,541, representing 23 per cent. of the total imports. This compares with 28 per cent. in 1922 and 32 per cent. in 1921 Syria is second with £E814,723, while Germany is third with £E471,432. In the export list Egypt and the Sudan are first with £E575,932, while Great Britain is third with £E291,706.

Commentator.

The National Bank of Egypt proposes a final dividend of 11 per cent., making 15 per cent. for 1923.

The production of the Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields for the week ended February 22 was: Gemsah, nil; Hurghada, 2.923 tons.

The Banca Commerciale Italiana is to open a branch at Fiume and to form auxiliary institutions in Egypt and Yugoslavia.

The Egyptian Ministry of Communications is forming a Committee to choose the members of the mission of technical men which it is sending to Europe this year for training in engineering workshops.

Egypt's imports in January amounted in value to £E3,925,390, as against exports totalling £E8,380,325. Compared with the corresponding month last year, imports show an increase of £E165,445, while the exports have risen by £E1,623,402.

Messrs. Furness, Withy and Co. announce that the position held by the late Mr. J. G. Evans as manager of the Mediterranean Department of the Johnston Line, has been filled by the appointment of Mr. J. W. Nicholson, who for a number of years was Mr. Evans' principal assistant.

The Department of Overseas Trade has received a notification from the Commercial Secretary at Athens to the effect that a certain co-operative union in Greece is desirous of receiving from British firms quotations for the supply of sound, heavy T-cloths for use in covering currants on the drying grounds. British firms interested in this inquiry can obtain the name and address of the applicants, together with further particulars, on application to the Department of Overseas Trade, 35, Old Queen Street, London, S.W.1.

Stock and Share Markets.

TONE GENERALLY QUIET.

Improvement in Gilt-edged.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday Morning.

We have had another quiet week on the Stock Exchange. On the whole, the markets have kept fairly firm, but there has been nothing in political events to induce investors to take a more active attitude, and business, generally speaking, has been on a most restricted scale. I suppose we must look for this kind of thing for the present, at any rate, but it is not a little disappointing to holders to have just a suggestion of activity and then to find the markets lapsing again into a state of stagnation.

Indian Issues Strong.

The feature of the week has been the relative strength of gilt-edged securities.. It is almost always so when the other markets are quiet. Indian stocks, it is to be noted, have displayed special strength. This is due, of course, to the improving financial position in India as outlined in the Financial Statement. This is dealt with elsewhere in these columns, and I will, therefore, only point out here that the market has been greatly impressed by the substantial reduction in the floating debt of India, and by the statement that there will be no external loan this year.

Strength of Gilt-edged.

Gilt-edged opened yesterday with a strong tone, and advances took place practically all along the line. Consols rose ¼ to 56⅜, the Conversion Loan at 75 7-16 showed a gain of ⅜, War Loan Fives at 101 were ¼ up, while Fundings gained ⅛ at 87⅝. As I indicated above, Indian stocks have been very strong, the gains in this section ranging from ½ to 1⅛. The Three per Cents. rose to 56⅞, a gain of 1⅛, the 5½ per Cents. are ½ up at 100¼, while the Seven per Cents. are a point up at 113. The Sudan 4½ per Cent. Guaranteed Loan has been firm at 93.

Foreign Stocks Variable.

A rather uncertain tone has ruled in the market for Foreign Government securities, and the quotations show about as many declines as rises. The generally uncertain situation on the Continent, and, of course, the vicissitudes of the exchanges which have again been rather variable, have exerted an adverse influence. French stocks have been irregular. War Loan Fives are 21¾, while the Four per Cents. are 17¾. Austrian Six per Cents. have been a firm spot, and at 89 are a point up, while Italian Rentes also show a gain of a point at 21¼. In Near Eastern securities Turkish Unified have been steady at 18. Greek securities have generally been dull, with Monopolies a point down at 38½. Roumanian Four per Cents., in which there has been some activity, are unchanged at 61½.

Industrials Quiet.

A very quiet tone has ruled in the Industrial group, and business indeed has been on a very small scale. Changes in prices were not of any great significance, and the undertone of the market generally is good, and it would not take much to bring about renewed activity. But while there is any possibility of Labour troubles this group is naturally bound to suffer.

Textiles have been dull. Coats are unchanged at 61s. 9d., but Courtaulds are 3d. down at 61s. 3d. Iron, Steel, and Engineering shares have been rather uncertain. Armstrongs are 3d. down at 16s., Dorman Longs have shed 6d. at 15s., Guest Keens are unchanged at 38s. 3d., while Vickers are 3d. lower at 12s. 9d.

Shipping securities have been steady. P. and O. Deferred have risen a point to 297, Cunards at 20s. 9d. are 3d. up, while Furness Withys are unchanged at 31s. 6d. There has not been much change in Banking descriptions. British Trade Corporations are ⅛ down at 2¼, Chartered of India are unchanged at 19⅞, National of India are the same at 44¼, Westminsters are unaltered at 17 3-16, Imperial of Persia remain at 7 7-16, while National of Egypt are unchanged at 24½. Tobaccos have been fairly steady. Bats are unchanged at 104s., while Imperial Tobaccos are 4½d. down at 69s.

Oils Heavy.

A distinctly heavy tone has ruled in the Oil group, and with some of the leading descriptions being offered the tendency was for the market to display weakness. Anglo-Persian Ordinary at 3 5-32 are 1-32 down, while Burmahs at 5 are ⅛ lower. Roumanian shares have been rather dull. Phœnix are 3d. down at 19s. 3d., Steaua Romana are unchanged at 11s. 6d., Dacia Romanos are the same at 12s. 6d., while Hamilton's Concessions remain at 1s. 6d. In Egyptians Anglo-Egyptian B are 1-16 down at 1¼, while Gemsah Oil Reefs are ¼. Eagle Transport are 4 11-16, Lobitos are 1-32 lower at 7 17-32, Mexican Eagles are 3d. down at 18s. 9d., while Shell Transport have shed 3-32 at 4 17-32.

Egyptians Firm.

Egyptian securities have generally been steady. Beheras are ¼ up at 9¾, but New Egyptian are 6d. down at 24s. 6d. Egyptian Markets are unchanged at 22s. 6d., Egyptian Salt and Soda are the same at 21s., while Gharbieh Lands are unaltered at 1⅞.

In Sudan descriptions, Sudan Plantations have continued to make a very firm showing, and at 7 3-16 are 1-16 up, while Kassala Cottons have gained 4½d. at 17s. 6d.

Rubbers Steady.

While the raw commodity continues to remain at a very low level, the share market is fairly steady, and there is very little stock floating about. I do not suppose any market can show a more determined section of holders. The general position is on the whole more promising. Stocks in London are smaller, and there are indications that the demand from abroad is on the up-grade. In the circumstances it would seem clear that before very long we shall see increasing activity in this market. In my opinion, two or three months at the outside will see a considerable difference, but this will naturally depend on what happens in the intervening period.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS.

The following extracts are taken from the current issue of the monthly circular of the Imperial Ottoman Bank:—

Constantinople.—The situation of the market shows no noticeable change when compared with that of last month. The tendency is, if anything, rather more optimistic, owing to the more hopeful views held in commercial circles with regard to the future. The present stocks are by no means excessive and the risk of becoming so does not arise in view of the great cautiousness shown in passing new orders to foreign markets. Indeed, the imports during the last month were in general on a small scale; on the other hand, the exportation of local products showed a better movement. The sales of mohair, carpets, and nuts, together with some important shipments of high-class tobaccos for account of America, caused money to be more abundant, relieving the monetary market to some extent. The shrinking of business both at Constantinople and in Anatolia, and the lack of animation in foreign trade have resulted in a very marked reduction in the movements of the port.

Tobaccos.—The market is steady for the present, and certain qualities, such as Samsoun-Baffra, experienced a substantial rise. The volume of local transactions was small owing to the stocks held by merchants being for the greater part exhausted or sold. Purchases have recommenced on the producing centres—Broussa, Adrianople, Ismid, Hendek, Dusdje, Gueive, Gunen, Balikesser, etc. A fairly considerable quantity of the 1922 crop tobaccos remained unsold in the Samsoun region, to which was added the product of the 1923 crop. This accumulation was caused by the fact that American firms, which almost exclusively purchased the Samsoun-Baffra tobaccos, had, for certain reasons, discarded the article. The situation improved quite recently and America bought Samsoun-Baffra tobacco to the extent of 14,000 to 15,000 bales, thereby causing a rise in prices of from 2 to 3 Ltqs. per Batman (4 okes of 8,264 lbs.). Italy, also, which had for some time suspended her purchases of Oriental tobaccos, seems to be interested again in these products; 3,000 to 4,000 bales of good quality tobacco were shipped to Trieste during the month. Inferior quality tobaccos have been shipped to Hamburg at regular intervals.

Adana.—Cultivators concluded cereal sowing operations during December, and the land is prepared for the cultivation of cotton next spring. Motor tractors and agricultural machines, the number of which has considerably increased, are rendering great services to agriculturists. Although it is not possible to foretell the importance of the next cotton crop, it would not come as a surprise, in view of the extent of the prepared area, if it attained 100,000 bales, which is approximately equal to pre-war figures. The Adana region, if it were not for the financial difficulties and the scarcity of labour, might become an agricultural region comparable with Egypt.

Beyrout.—The last quarter of 1923 showed considerable activity. Merchants from the interior as well as from Anatolia and Adana made important purchases on the market. Imports were made up principally of cottons and woollens, silks and linen draperies, leathers, hides and footwear, paper, soap, rice, sugar, coffee, and building materials. Goods of French, Italian and Belgian origin were disposed of rapidly, but not those from Great Britain, Spain or America.

LONDON PRODUCE REPORT.

Oranges in Good Request.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)
London, Tuesday Morning.

Sugar.—Home refined has been in fair demand. Tate's cubes have come to business at 67s. 9d., London granulated has been done at 64s. 1½d., while Lyle's granulated is 64s. 4½d. Foreign descriptions have been firm. White Java has been done at 61s. 3d., while Czech granulated has come to business at 62s. 9d. Futures have been fairly steady. Quotations are:—May, 32s. 9d.; August, 30s. 3d.; November, 24s. 6d. December, 24s. 6d.

Coffee.—The feature of the week has been the rise in Costa Rica to 170s., an advance of 10s. on the week. East Indian is unchanged at 164s., while Nairobi remains at 124s. Santos, on the other hand, has risen sharply from 84s. to 90s.

Oilseeds.—Linseed has been quiet. Indian is 22s. 3d., while La Plata is 19s. Rapeseed has been dull. Toria is 19s. 6d., while real bold Ferozepore is 18s. Cottonseed has been rather easy. Indian is 10s. 7½d., Egyptian black is 13s. 3d., while Sakellaridis is 13s. 3d.

Seed Oils.—Linseed has been easy at 44s. Rape oil has been quiet, with crude at 48s. and technical refined at 51s. Cotton oil has been steady. Refined common edible is 50s., Bombay crude is 43s., Egyptian crude is 44s., technical is 46s., deodorised is 52s., while Egyptian refined is 49s.

Oil Cakes.—The market has been rather variable. Linseed cake is 5s. down at 280s., coconut cake is 5s. up at 205s., while cottonseed cake has risen 10s. to 190s.

Dried Fruit.—Business in this market has been generally good. Currants have hardened slightly, but have continued to move off very freely. Sultanas have been the medium of a fair business, with Smyrnas in good request. A strong demand has developed for figs, and the business in this commodity has indeed been the feature of the week. Plums have also been a good spot. The demand for Bosnians is increasing, which should be an encouragement to the Yugoslav growers. There has not been much doing as regards dates.

Oranges.—A very large business has been carried out during the week, and it is evident that the rate of consumption is on the increase, as, of course, is to be expected at this period of the year. Jaffas, it may be noted, have come in for special attention.

SMYRNA FRUIT MARKET.

Messrs. C. J. Giraud and Co., of Smyrna, report as follows for the week ended February 16:—

The arrivals of sultanas on the Smyrna market since the season began are estimated at 36,400 tons, and the sales are put at 35,400 tons. The market continues quiet. Operations are on a very small scale, and the quotations are somewhat nominal.

A further report, dated February 23, states:—

The estimated arrivals of sultanas now total 36,100 tons, and the sales are put at 35,600 tons. Prices have receded during the interval of the past month about 7s. per cwt. from the highest point touched. Operations continue on a small scale. The future course of prices will be influenced by the extent of the spring demand. In view of the very light stocks remaining, it will take very little buying to stabilise the position. An advance, however, is unlikely, as it is believed that stocks in the U.K. are sufficient to meet a portion of the spring demand from other markets in competition to offers from Smyrna.

DRIED FRUIT REPORT.

Messrs. J. C. Houghton and Co., of Liverpool, report as follows under date March 1:—

Currants.—The market maintained the strong tone referred to in the closing days of last month into the early weeks of February, and gave promise of a healthy state of trading for the remainder of the month, but, unfortunately, the disorganisation of trade caused by the dockers' strike and the consequent dislocation of the means of distribution practically brought the market to a standstill, with the inevitable result of havoc to general business. The Blaafjeld and Pavia with 450 tons arrived since our last report. The little trading has centred round Calamata 45s. 6d. to 46s., Zante 47s. to 49s., Gulf 48s. to 50s., Panariti 54s. to 56s., Vostizza 58s. to 63s., finest Shade Dried 68s. to 72s. Cleaned varieties being in most request at 48s. to 53s. Quotations:—Calamata, 45s. to 46s.; Zante, 48s. to 52s.; Gulf and Panariti, 48s. to 56s.; Vostizza, 58s. to 72s.

Raisins.—Valencia: These are practically neglected, movements being quite insignificant; quarter boxes 47s. 6d. Australian Lexias: Slow, 45s.

Sultanas.—Smyrna: With the closing down of the Continental inquiry it soon became evident that we were in for a quiet time, and with the development of the labour trouble business dwindled to very meagre dimensions, and the position at the moment is one of awaiting a revival of interest. These continued disputes, and fears of further trouble in the near future, are exercising a very restraining influence on buyers, making them ultra-cautious in their operations. The limited business consisted of cleaned 58s. to 66s., and fine 74s. to 90s. Greek 50s. to 60s., old fruit 46s. Cretan.—Shippers are removing their limits and showing more disposition to compete for business. A few fine have changed hands at 90s. Afghan.—The new fruit arriving is very unattractive, and shows no value at prices quoted—i.e., Red 50s., Yellow 60s. Old fruit moving at 43s.

Figs.—Some trade is passing in Smyrna bags genuine naturals, 36s. to 38s.

THE CZECHO-SLOVAK COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH ITALY.

The negotiations for the commercial treaty between Czecho-Slovakia and Italy are making rapid progress. The majority of the demands made on both sides have already been conceded, and there are only a few points left for settlement. It is hoped that the negotiations will be concluded and the treaty signed in the early part of this month. In addition to the general clauses, the treaty will contain an extensive schedule of commodities which can be freely imported into Czecho-Slovakia. It is pointed out, however, that the majority of these articles can already be imported unrestrictedly, subject only to a formal declaration. There will also be further schedules regarding the import contingents into Czecho-Slovakia and Italy respectively, as well as a list of reduced tariffs in the two countries concerned.

CZECHO-SLOVAKIA'S COAL OUTPUT.

In the Ostrava-Karvina mines, which constitute the main coalfield in Czecho-Slovakia, the output in 1923 was 1,541,560 tons in excess of the output for 1922—an increase of 23½ per cent. The production of coke at Vitkovice and Trinec was 1,755,360 tons, as against 847,920 tons in 1922—an improvement of over 100 per cent. The output of briquettes was 33,340 tons, compared with 16,570 tons in 1922. The number of men employed in the mines was 2.4 per cent. less than in 1922; the number in the coke sheds 29 per cent. more than in 1922.

CZECHO-SLOVAKIA'S SUGAR.

According to a report in the Narodni Listy, the stocks of sugar in Czecho-Slovakia have fallen to 750,000 quintals, while up to the end of January export trade had absorbed half the production. Great quantities have also been sold in advance, due for delivery when navigation on the Elbe has been opened out, the chief importing countries being England and United States of America. During January 17,378 tons of sugar were produced, so that the total sugar production has now reached the amount of 974,728 tons of raw sugar. During the same period of last year the production amounted to 716,378 tons. By the end of January 1,378,480 quintals of molasses were produced in Czecho-Slovakia, as against 1,170,920 quintals produced during the same period last year.

During January Czecho-Slovakia exported 33,087 tons of sugar, as against 30,024 tons in January, 1923. Of this quantity 26,937 tons were refined sugar and 2,379 tons raw sugar. The total export of this season amounts to 342,598 tons, as against 160,582 tons of last year. The largest quantities were exported to England, Austria, and Switzerland—namely, almost half of the exports. During January 7,226 tons were exported from Bohemia, 13,587 tons from Moravia and Silesia, and 6,124 tons from Slovakia of refined sugar.

OTTOMAN RAILWAY DEBENTURES SCHEME.

In a circular issued to the debenture stockholders of the Ottoman Railway from Smyrna to Aidin the Council of Administration state that during the past few months it has been possible for them to estimate with some degree of accuracy the damage that this company has suffered as a result of a struggle which lasted practically ten years. In the first place, they have lodged a claim against the Turkish Government for heavy damages and losses incurred, and this claim has been pressed, and will continue to be pressed, with all the vigour at their command in an endeavour to arrive at a just and equitable settlement. Nevertheless difficulties in the way of an immediate settlement are great, and present indications tend to show that even when the amount of compensation is agreed it will not be paid in such a form as to bring immediate financial benefit to the company. The depopulation of the country, the devastated condition of many of the districts, and the general dislocation of trade consequent on the burning of Smyrna, are all factors which are most prejudicial to the company's interests and likely to remain so for some considerable time. Arrears of interest and interest thereon on the 4 per cent. first debenture stock since July, 1918, amount to £668,996 17s. 3d., and the respective figure for the 5 per cent. second debenture stock is £601,623 3s. 6d.

To enable the immediate resumption of cash payments to the debenture holders instead of waiting for a settlement till one year after the ratification of peace with Turkey, it is proposed that:—

Six years' interest and interest thereon on the whole of the 4 per cent. first debenture stock and 5 per cent. second debenture stock (that is from July 1, 1918, to July 1, 1924) are to be cancelled. Interest without interest thereon on the stock of both classes outstanding on December 31, 1917, for the six months ended on June 30, 1918, is to be paid in cash on or as soon as may be after July 1, 1924. As from that date the distinction which at present exists between the stock of each class issued before June 30, 1918, and that issued on or after that date will disappear, and the company's authorised debenture debt will consist of

£2,364,104 15s. 11d. of first debenture stock, the interest on which will be increased to 5 per cent., and

£1,729,567 4s. 6d. of second debenture stock, the interest on which will be increased to 6 per cent., of which 4 per cent. will be fixed and cumulative, and 2 per cent. will be dependent on profits until the full 6 per cent. has been earned in three consecutive years. The second debenture stock will carry voting rights on the same basis as the share capital.

The present debenture stock reserve fund will be merged in a new fund of £200,000 in cash or securities, which, subject to the payment of interest on the first debenture stock, will be available to meet any deficiency of profits below the amount required to pay 4 per cent. interest on the second debenture stock until such time as the whole 6 per cent. interest on that stock becomes cumulative. No dividend is to be paid on the share capital so long as any interest on the first debenture stock or any cumulative interest on the second debenture stock is in arrear. The annual sum required to pay 5 per cent. interest on the first debenture stock and 4 per cent. interest on the second debenture stock (apart from stocks amounting to £200,000 issued by way of security only) is £178,387 18s. 7d. The estimated profit of the year to December 31, 1923, after making provision for the interest on the £9,600 5 per cent. bonds (1935) still outstanding and for reserves, renewals, etc., is about £150,000, which, with the interest on the company's investments and a small contribution from the capital of the debenture stock reserve fund, will make up the above sum.

The scheme will be submitted at a meeting of debenture stockholders at Winchester House, E.C., on March 27, at 11.30 a.m.

CREDIT FONCIER EGYPTIEN.

Egypt's Economic Position.

A Satisfactory Year.

The following is a translation of the report of the Crédit Foncier Egyptien, which was presented to the shareholders at the annual meeting, held at Cairo on January 18:—

During 1923 Egypt has carried forward the realisation of her political programme in giving herself a constitution and in proceeding to hold elections, which will terminate shortly in the formation of a Parliament consisting of a Chamber of Deputies and a Senate. This political development has been carried out quietly, owing largely to the prosperous economic condition of the country.

The Cotton Situation.

The cotton crop of 1922 was disposed of without difficulty. The stock at Alexandria on September 1, 1922, amounted to 1,332,000 kantars. The arrivals of the season reached 6,713,312 kantars, making the total 8,045,312 kantars. But at August 31, 1923, the stock was reduced to 803,000 kantars. The exports and local consumption had then reached 7,242,312 kantars. The prices ruling have undergone small variations between 30 and 35 talaris, or almost double the pre-War price. The prospects for the crop of 1923 are most favourable. The price of cotton sharply rose by the end of November to 50 talaris. The yields will be normal, and the exports are more active than in the past year, reaching on December 28 3,419,470 kantars, against 3,120,003 at December 28, 1922. The share market has thus received a considerable stimulus. It is especially to be noted that for a long time past local savings have not been appealed to for an issue of any importance emanating from the State or private companies. It has found, on the contrary, for the past three or four years considerable support in Egyptian shares which are dealt in abroad and which Egyptian capitalists have been able easily to acquire by virtue of the exchanges. Despite the large number of shares thus imported, the prices of the leading securities have recorded this year appreciable rises.

The Balance-sheet.

The balance-sheet which we present to you reflects the situation. As regards mortgages, the realisations of loans during the year have been £E1,428,645, or £E192,730 below the total of redemptions, which stand at £E1,621,425. The redemptions anticipated in cash have been £E244,496. The sales by auction have represented £E,75,620. The balance of the account for annual and half-yearly payments and interest due amounted at October 31, 1922, to £E1,439,137. Adding the maturities of the year, £E2,028,515, we have a total of £E3,467,652. At October 31, 1923, we had collected £E2,140,890. The amount of our arrears stands thus at £E1,326,762, and affects little more than last year or the year before the position with regard to payments due. There have been collected during the year 1923 on annual payments £E278,713 more than during 1922. The item of "Tiers Adjudicataires" is reduced during the year from £E133,379 to £E112,564. The balance of the account real estate acquired by expropriation has remained almost unchanged at £E25,178. All these heads show, as can be seen, satisfactory results from the point of view of our mortgage business.

As regards our securities, you will note a decrease of £300,000 in National War Bonds, realised for the needs of our treasury, and an important increase in our Egyptian shares, which have been increased to £E1,749,704. We have purchased at prices deemed advantageous £E320,620 of Egyptian Priv. 3½ per cent. and £E902,300 of Egyptian Unified 4 per cent. The conditions have enabled us to carry out actively the redemption of our bonds. The purchases effected during the year totalled 80,000 shares. At October 31, 1923, we had in hand 167,618 bonds, representing an investment at an average rate of 5.84 per cent. These bonds have been acquired at a total cost of £E1,819,365, at which they figure in the balance-sheet. This total is £E891,364 below the cost price of the bonds in our books, without taking account of the redemption premiums.

Profit and Loss Account.

The profit and loss account has been able to draw from these new investments as well as from the increased interest arising from the discounting of French bills, a profit which has almost compensated for the disappearance of certain exceptional receipts of which we have been deprived this year. Our expenditure shows a decrease of £E26,892. French taxes are put at £E16,676, as a result of the reduction in the amount of bonds liable to taxation. This decrease would have been still more marked if the increase in the transfer tax from 0.50 to 0.60 per cent. had not been voted in June and applied from July 1, 1923.

The gross revenue of the year amounted to £E2,029,204. The corresponding expenditure was £E1,329,233. The amount of distributable profit stands thus at £E699,971, enabling the allocation of P.T. 140 to the Ordinary shares and £E35 to the Founders' shares, subject to deduction of French taxes, or, under the present regime, P.T. 23 for the shares which circulate in France or on which the coupon No. 49 has been paid in France and 12 per cent. for the Founders' shares liable to French taxes. If you agree to these proposals the position of the various reserve and provision accounts will stand as follows at November 1, 1923:—Statutory reserve £E830,170.062, or 21,520,934.86 frs.; extraordinary reserve, £E970,773.067, or 25,165,860.45 frs.; provision for the reduction of the premium on bonds, £E574,416.580, or 14,890,902.92 frs.; provision and reserve for sundry contingencies, £E1,343,985.230, or 34,840,835.51 frs.; provision for dividend on shares, £E235,483.529, or 6,104,563.30 frs.; total, £E3,954,828.468, or 102,523,097.04 frs.; loan account for drawings of the 1911 issue. £E146,818.212, or 3,806,045.68 frs.; total, £E4,101,646.680, or 106,329,142.72 frs. For the account, "Provision for the amortisation of bonds," £E1,030,017.953, or 26,701,696.77 frs. In conclusion, we desire to address to our staff an expression of our satisfaction and gratitude for the devotion with which they have carried out their work.

Resolutions of Meeting.

The general meeting (1) approved the accounts for the year ended October 31, 1923; (2) adopted the division of profits proposed by the board of directors, and decided in consequence on (a) the distribution for the year on the 400,000 shares of a dividend of P.T. 140 per share, £E560,000, or 14,517,174.34 frs.; on the 2,000 Founders' shares of P.T. 3,500 per share, £E70,000, or 1,814,646.79 frs.; (b) the allocation to the statutory reserve of £E46,852.140, or 1,214,572.65 frs.; to the board of directors £E23,426.070, or 607,286.32 frs.; (c) to carry forward from the account of the ordinary shares £E14,106.344, or 365,686.17 frs.; from the account of the Founders' shares £E354.078, or 9,178.95 frs.; total, £E714,738.632, or 18,528,545.22 frs., representing the amounts of the profits of the year and the sums brought forward from the previous year; (3) decided that the dividend on the ordinary shares and on the Founders' shares should be payable in Cairo in piastres, and in Paris and London at the rates of exchange fixed by the board of directors, less French taxes, or P.T. 23 for the shares which circulate in France or on which coupon No. 49 has been paid in France and 12 per cent. for the Founders' shares liable to French taxes; (4) re-elected in accordance with Articles 15 and 36 of the statutes as director for five years, M. H. Guernaut; (5) confirmed, in accordance with Article 77 of the statutes, the appointment as directors provisionally made by the board, of Baron G. Brincard and M. M. Vincenot; (6) re-elected as auditors for one year, MM. R. Finzi and E. Berthy. These resolutions were carried unanimously.

Cotton and Cotton Goods.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Fluctuations in Futures.

The Alexandria Commercial Company, in their report for the week ended February 22, state :— Since our last report the futures market has fluctuated widely; at the close the tone became somewhat poor. New York has been extremely disappointing and has registered almost daily new low levels of prices, the reason being poor trade in dry goods and consequent increased curtailment of production by the mills. Reports from England have not been brighter : the dockers' strike and the proposed short time in the American section affected the market very unfavourably, and induced heavy selling on speculative account and liquidation of old bull positions. Spot sales in Liverpool have continued fairly large, but we understand that a considerable part of same are for export account either for Russia or the Continent. That these countries should prefer to fulfil their requirements in Liverpool instead of Alexandria is but natural, prices in the former market continuing to be so much cheaper compared to the latter. In Alexandria the position has kept relatively firmer than New York and Liverpool, and, although prices have receded somewhat, there has been no panic whatever; pressure on the market has been mainly by speculation, commerce in general being a buyer during the decline, the lower prices having attracted some demand from abroad. The difference between Sakellaridis and Ashmouni remains almost unchanged. The discounts of new crop options for both Sakellaridis and Ashmouni compared to the near positions have narrowed. More business has taken place in new crop than previously; we think, however, that this activity is more speculative than commercial. Arrivals from up-country continue on a fair scale, and there is now not the slightest doubt that by the end of the season the total quantity received in Alexandria will exceed 6¼ million kantars. The total exports to date are still superior to the figure of the corresponding period last year, and this is a very bullish point in the position. Under present conditions we do not think that the market should drop much further and, on the other hand, a little more activity in the industrial centres would be sufficient to cause a quick recovery of the ground recently lost. The week's arrivals amount to 130,810 krs. against exports 147,163 krs. : the stock stands at 1,766,185 krs. Spot : We have had a quiet week at Minet el Bassal, and sales amount to about 11,800 B/s, of which we estimate 7,600 B/s Sakel, 4,050 B/s Uppers, and 150 B/s Brown and Pilion. Demand from abroad continues moderate. Arrivals and exports continue on a fair scale, and the stock shows a slight decrease from last week.

Sakellaridis : There has been business in all styles at about the same difference, with contracts as last week with the exception of grades below Good Fair, which are rather dearer.

Uppers : All styles have been dealt in. Prices of spot against contracts are at last week's rates for Good Fair and better, but are rather dearer for cotton below Good Fair.

Brown and Pilion : A moderate business has been done. Prices of spot against contracts are rather dearer for cotton below Good Fair and unchanged for other grades.

White : Is neglected and no business is reported. Quotations of spot against contracts are rather dearer except for Good Fair, which is easier.

Crop 1924 : Preparation of land and sowing in Upper Egypt and in the southern districts of the Delta are in progress. Climatic conditions during the last ten days have been favourable to these operations.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Market Situation now Obscure.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended February 27 :—

Egyptian Spot.—The continued weakness of the futures markets has succeeded in undermining, to a large extent, the confidence which has hitherto been felt in the strength of the situation as a whole. The past week started well, with large sales both of American and Egyptian, a considerable amount of fixing, and glowing reports from Manchester. However, hopes and steadier prices and improved business here have once again been thwarted by a series of tumbling markets in New York, and fears of a "lock-out" in the Lancashire mills. At the moment, the situation is very obscure, and spinners (and others) are at a loss what to make of it. A week ago there seemed to be plenty of business about, particularly in Manchester, and signs were not wanting that many spinners believed that the bottom had been reached. To-day the situation has changed completely, the slump continues unabated, and experience in the past has shown that confidence, once shaken, is not easily restored.

The local inquiry has covered practically all varieties of Egyptian cotton, and again we have to record a tendency on the part of buyers to select the better grades. The fact is that spinners are finding the so-called "cheap" lots of good fair and F.G.F. Sakellaridis so wasty this year that it comes cheaper for them in the long run to pay more money for the higher priced cotton and "get the goods." Already, it has become rather the exception than the rule to find a lot of F.G.F. Sakellaridis of which the staple is anything more than " fair." One hundred on, or over, has to be paid to-day for the " very fair " or " good " staple F.G.F. cotton. There has been an inclination this week for the lower qualities to stiffen somewhat, and this has been borne out in the official quotations. Uppers have attracted a considerable amount of attention, which has been mostly concerned with the F.G.F. quality at about pass price current contracts. Good to fine uppers have become scarce, and holders are not parting readily with their cotton. Low cotton, Sudan, brown, white Egypts, and white Sudan have all come in for a small share of attention, but only a moderate amount of business has resulted. C.i.f. business has been quiet, but Alexandria prices, when really tested, have been easier than has been the case for some time.

Forwardings to spinners for the week ending the 22nd inst. were returned as 7,574 bales, a low figure, for which the recent dock strike has been responsible. Estimated sales, 3,800 Egyptians and 150 bales Sudan. Quotations of Sakellaridis are reduced 110 points, with the exception of fair, which is 75 points lower. Quotations of brown and upper are reduced 130 points for good fair, fully good fair and good. Fine and extra fine are 80 points lower, and fair exceptionally 75 points lower. F.G.F. Sakel to-day. 20.65d.

CZECHO-SLOVAKIA'S WOOLLEN INDUSTRY.

The British Vice-Consul at Prague (Mr. J. W. Taylor) has forwarded to the Department of Overseas Trade the annual report for 1923 of the Brünn Woollen Industry Association, together with the following translation of the leading article on the present conditions in the industry.

The Brünn woollen industry is slowly recovering from the crisis of 1922. During the sudden rise of the Czech exchange, in 1922, the textile industry, and the woollen industry in particular, suffered most severely. At the end of 1922 employment in the woollen industry had sunk to a level never previously recorded in its history. In 1923 an improvement set in. The stabilised rate of the Czech crown caused a marked improvement in the trade, and was the principal reason for the marked improvement in the condition of the woollen industry. Buyers regained confidence, and new orders for the home and foreign trade were placed, as there was no fear of stocks losing value through a new rise of the crown. It must be admitted that the cost of production is only slowly adapting itself to the present value of the crown. Rates and taxes have not yet been adjusted to the present rate of exchange; whilst the State tariffs of all kinds are much too high, and the reduction in wages is not yet proportionate to the present value of the crown. Progress has, however, been made in one direction, for manufacturers are now not forced by circumstances to speculate on the course of exchange against their own will, but can rely on some sort of stable basis in their calculations. The crisis has involved our woollen industry in losses amounting to millions, both in the home and foreign markets. The depreciation of stocks was a hard blow to manufacturers and merchants alike. The rise of the crown made it difficult in many cases for foreign buyers to meet their engagements in Czech crowns.

Besides the stabilisation of the crown, conditions in Germany have had an influence on trade. There is very little reciprocal business done in manufactured woollen goods, which are subject in both countries to a system of import permits. During the continual fall of the mark for several months in 1923 the German woollen industry was our greatest competitor in foreign markets. The German woollen industry was fully employed and even occasionally working overtime, when only a small proportion of our factories and workmen had work. During the unsettled conditions in Germany, German competition entirely disappeared at times; and it was only after the introduction of the gold mark and the end of passive resistance in the Ruhr that the German woollen industry made its reappearance on the world's markets as an effective competitor, particularly in staple and mass production articles.

From the statistics of employment and production in 1923 it appears that the fifty-two firms, members of the Brünn Textile Industrial Association, employing normally 19,804 hands, were employing at the end of 1923 14,963 hands, i.e., 76 per cent. of the normal number, most of whom were working full time. Two factories were idle throughout the year, one of them having entirely stopped its production and dismantled its machinery. The statistics showed that business increased until about the middle of the year; thereafter it maintained with very slight fluctuations the level reached.

The increased output at the end of the summer season 1923 was caused principally by the very low production which had preceded it, and the demand of the home market which made itself felt. The winter season demand developed comparatively slowly. The fine weather, in autumn in particular, postponed the winter season, so that goods remained in stock instead of being turned into cash and assisting trade. Orders for the next summer season were coming in slowly at the end of the year. Austrian buyers have been prominent, although latterly this market, especially Vienna, has been dominated by foreign industry—Germany, Italy, France, England, Belgium, and Holland. Vienna is again becoming important for our woollen industry, serving as an intermediary for a large part of the trade which was previously done direct between Czecho-Slovakia and Hungary; while much of the business in the old and new territories of Yugoslavia and Roumania passes through Viennese middlemen.

The situation of the woollen industry still remains a very difficult one. Wool is quoted at the end of 1923 at more than double and cotton at more than treble its pre-War price reckoned in gold. As our home market is too small to absorb the output of our industry, the latter is compelled to find foreign markets for the greater part of its output if it is to remain sound. In common with all other industries, the woollen industry regards it as a matter of supreme importance that the crown should be stabilised, and that the rates and taxes should be adjusted to the rate of exchange. Only after a satisfactory solution of this problem will it be possible for the Czecho-Slovak woollen industry, and especially the Brünn woollen industry, to hold its own in international competition.

LANDING CHARGES AT PALESTINE.

The landing charges for merchandise at the ports of Jaffa and Haifa have been the subject of constant disputes between consignees, shipping agents, and lightermen for many years prior to the war, says the Commercial Bulletin of Palestine. It is the custom at both ports for the agents to charge the consignee a fee covering the total handling charges from ship's side to outward clearance from the Customs. Lighterage charges for the landing of the goods from ship's side to quay side and agents' fees for supervision and commission, etc., are included in this general fee. The Ports Dues Ordinance promulgated on January 27, 1921, provided the Controller of Ports with much-needed powers to lay down a tariff of charges. At Jaffa the first tariff was drawn up by a Board of Arbitration. Agreement was reached in June, 1921, after protracted negotiations between the interests involved. The lighterage rates were fixed on the tonnage capacity of each lighter, while the agents' fees were based on a varying charge for every metric ton. A second tariff involving further reductions was brought into force in July, 1922, and a third in July, 1923. But for the attitude of the lightermen the charges should be subject to a further reduction, but the monopoly held by the seamen of the port make it improbable that any substantial decrease in the total charges can be introduced for the present, unless the Government is prepared to import skilled labour from Egypt or elsewhere. The new rates for the port of Jaffa, which were published in July, 1923, have given rise to dissatisfaction among both the agents and the lightermen. The former have complained that the reductions made from time to time have invariably been effected at the expense of the agent, while the latter protest that the difficult nature of their calling makes a reduction of the lighterage rates an extreme measure. The lightermen have not so far agreed to this tariff, and in order that the necessary powers may be conferred upon the Director of Customs and Trade (who now undertakes port functions) an Ordinance is in preparation to ensure compliance and to impose penalties for contravention.

The charges in Haifa are calculated, both for lighterage and agents' fees, on a tonnage basis alone. A tariff of charges was published in June, 1922, and a second in June, 1923. Lighterage charges and agents' fees at both ports are calculated according to the weight per metric ton or per ton measurement. The manner in which freight has been paid on board ship determines whether the fees are to be charged on the basis of the metric ton or per ton measurement, and in the latter case a ton measurement is considered as equivalent to fifty cubic feet. The charges for Haifa are lower than those of Jaffa. This is to be expected owing to the sheltered roadstead and the better landing and cranage facilities at the port; the Haifa rates compare very favourably with those of the Syrian port of Beyrout, the charges being slightly lower at Haifa.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Transfer of the Khalifate.

Within a few days of the abolition of the Ottoman Khalifate by Republican Turkey the vacant headship of the world of Islam has been assumed by King Hussein of the Hejaz. It needs the jaundiced outlook of a French publicist to discover in this step the darkly scheming mind of perfidious Albion. Those better versed in Eastern affairs will decide, first, that if Great Britain wanted a "British" Khalif she would have looked elsewhere; and, secondly, that King Hussein, who is at the moment in Transjordania, required no encouragement on the part of Great Britain to take the most obvious course open to him. It would be idle to suppose that the idea of usurping the Khalifate has never occurred to the Shereef of Mecca since he led the revolt of the Arabs against the Turks; but the fact remains that so long as there was a Turkish Khalif he made no move in this direction. Now that the Turks themselves have repudiated the Khalifate, King Hussein has, no doubt, tried to obviate competition for the post by losing no time in having himself proclaimed Khalif. Moslem opinion, it is to be inferred, endorses the contention that there ought to be no long interregnum in the headship of Islam; but whether it will call for a more regular election than that which has taken place at Amman remains to be seen.

The Secularisation of Turkey.

The rapidity with which the Khalifate has been taken over by another people may well cause the Angora Assembly to wonder whether it has done well to sever quite so suddenly Turkey from the headship of Islam. Just as the Tribunal of Independence sent to Constantinople to lay bare plots against the Republic could find nothing to confirm the Government's suspicions, so there has been no circumstance attending the expulsion of the Khalif which would lend any colour to the idea that Turkey is rid of an arch-enemy. The Khalif Abdul Mejid left the country as he has lived in it, a loyal and dignified Prince, more concerned for the welfare of his country than for his own position or personal safety. The suddenness of his expulsion may have reflected prudence born of military instinct or genuine anxiety for the safety of the new order, which is dependent on force rather than on popular support. Republican Turkey, however, is resolved to be thorough in all it does, although there may be little thoroughness in the reflection preceding its actions. It has decided upon a clean slate, and any institution affecting the political life of the people that existed prior to 1918 is liable to be abolished. The experiment merits the respect that boldness can command, and it will be interesting to note whether it proves to be the opinion of the new rulers of Turkey that the Moslem religion is incompatible with the success of a modern State, or merely that certain features of that religion are a clog on the material progress of a State. In either case, they are dealing with a thorny subject, which it might be thought they would have preferred to keep in abeyance until the new order has been able to establish itself more securely in a much-tried nation.

India and the Khalifate.

For Great Britain the only interest in the Khalifate developments is the additional confirmation that they provide of the gross dishonesty of the Khalifate agitation in India. When it is recalled that one of the leaders of that agitation solemnly assured the British Government that the retention by Turkey of its pre-War territories was a spiritual necessity—an article of Moslem faith associated with the Khalifate which admitted of no discussion—and that any encroachment on those territories would absolve the true Moslem of allegiance to Great Britain, it will be seen to what lengths the agitators were prepared to go in the hope of embarrassing Great Britain. They made no move when the Sultanate was abolished, and may still have deceived themselves into the belief that the sanctity of the dual office belonged to the Khalifate part alone. Now that the Turks have abolished that as well, it will be of interest to see what steps the Khalifate agitators propose to take. That they will try to make amends to the British or India Government need not be expected. For their own sake, however, it would be thought that they will endeavour to make an intelligent contribution to the Khalifate question. If King Hussein wishes to find support in India for his claims to the Khalifate his first concern will be to meet Indian objections to certain aspects of the great pilgrimage to Mecca. Indeed, one of the advantages to be derived from a conference representative of the Moslem world would be that it could at one and the same time regularise the appointment of the Khalif and help to remove grievances connected with the Haj.

The Crisis in Greece.

The Greek tragedy continues to unfold itself as the State, started on its downward course, by M. Venizelos in 1915, gathers the inevitable momentum. A Greek Republic follows as the corollary of the principle which he then laid down and raised a rebellion to substantiate—that the King could do nothing right. Greece became split into two political factions which alternately carried the day. The next step was for the army to take charge of the situation, and it has now ordained a Republic. If in this form the Greek State once again achieves stability, it is to be feared that uphill work awaits it before it can hope to reach its former position and contentedness of mind. The events of the last ten weeks since M. Venizelos returned to Greece have confirmed the point consistently ignored by M. Venizelos himself that, in spite of his wonderful hold on the imagination of his countrymen, he has never known his Greece nor understood the Greeks. He misjudged entirely the temper of the nation when, with the help of the Allies, he gained his first victory over King Constantine; even when he had been supreme in Greece during the years of the latter's first exile, he had no knowledge of the strong royalist feeling which, at the first opportunity, was to pronounce emphatically against him. At the beginning of this year, when he reluctantly agreed to return to Greece, he was under no illusion as to the attitude of a large section of the people towards him, but he had not realised how the indiscipline which he had been the first to promote had fastened upon the nation. In spite of the execution of the six Ministers, he had given his blessing to the Revolutionary Committee, and had endorsed its Republican leanings. Officially, the Committee could dissolve, but the revolutionary spirit remained. It has broken M. Venizelos, and seems likely to win its first trial of strength with monarchist Greece over the question of a Republic.

A New Greek Government.

The actual course of events in Greece has been that the Cabinet of M. Kaphandaris, who succeeded M. Venizelos as Prime Minister on February 7, has been forced to resign in the face of the determination of the Republican officers in the army to force a Republic on the country before a plebiscite can be held. This moment has been chosen by M. Venizelos to return to France, in acknowledgment of the fact that he is no longer in a position to influence the current of Greek affairs. The Regent has sent for M. Papanastasiou, who, as the head of the militant Republicans, will form a Cabinet with the avowed object of forcing a Bill for the overthrow of the dynasty and the establishment of a Republic through the Assembly, which has already twice voted, with substantial majorities, against the proposal for setting up a Republic before the nation has recorded its judgment by means of a plebiscite. The Republicans appear to be confident that the Assembly will now accept the logic of events and stultify its former votes. Even if it should not, there are no indications at present that the monarchist section of the nation, although in a majority, has the heart to resist the Republican movement to the point of civil war.

Mosul and Bluff.

It would seem hardly possible for Turkey to postpone much longer the negotiations which, under the Treaty of Lausanne, are to take place with Great Britain over the future of Mosul. In a short time, therefore, we may expect to hear that the discussions have been opened, and it will be as well for public opinion in this country to be prepared for any possible setting that the Turkish Government may give to the conference. At the Lausanne Conference, it will be remembered, Angora sought to reinforce her diplomacy by spreading reports of movements of troops and concentrations on the Irak frontiers. Nothing of the sort, as a matter of fact, took place; but the reports, as they were intended to do, caused well-meaning people in this country to grow eloquent over the danger that the British Government was running of plunging the Empire into war for the sake of a few oil magnates. It may be doubted whether republican Turkey will have any better card to play when the Mosul negotiations are renewed, and we may, therefore, look for a repetition of the former tactics. Possibly the laying of emphasis in public speeches on the need for increasing the strength of the Turkish Army is to be regarded as the first move in the game. If, however, the British public consents to be forewarned, it may be prevented from playing into Turkey's hands in this matter. Mosul is not wanted for British oil interests, but because the territory is essential to the security and prosperity of Irak, of which it forms a geographical, ethnographical, and economic part. As the Turks are not lacking in intelligence and common sense, a round-table conference with a straightforward issue is all that is required to convince them of the fact, to the lasting benefit of Anglo-Turkish-Arab relations. If, on the other hand, they imagine that they can work for their own ends on British fears or prejudice, the negotiations will be unduly prolonged, and may give rise to regrettable complications. A strong case exists in this instance for giving the British negotiators a free hand and for the country to support them by a discreet silence, rage Turks and pacifists never so furiously.

The Human Factor.

The task of replying to a toast in connection with an appointment which has yet to be taken up is never an easy one; but Lord Goschen, Governor-Designate of Madras, struck a happy note last week in emphasising the human factor in the maintenance of cordial relations between Britons and Indians dealing with India's great problems. Perhaps the greatest snare in the path of any highly placed official is that he should become so engrossed with the routine of his office or with questions of State as to forget the importance of the personal equation. Too often the daily work of a high office leaves scant leisure for indulgence in the art of accessibility, and an official will be blamed for the lack of a virtue which he possesses to the full but is unable to display. A cure for such cases may possibly be found in the discovery of the ideal division as between responsibilities towards an exacting Government and responsibilities towards the governed. Certain it is that an excellent example is now being set in the different Presidencies, and we may hope that the value of the human factor will be taken to heart, not only throughout India, but also wherever British representatives act as interpreters of British ideas and standards to Eastern peoples.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

The Westminster Election.

Public attention during the past week has been a good deal on foreign affairs, and the most prominent topic, apart from these, has been the Westminster election and the chances therein of Mr. Churchill's returning to Parliament. Nothing could so clearly indicate the political mess into which we have fallen as this Abbey contest, in which the best that the Liberal and Labour Parties can do in the way of candidates is to put forward Messrs. Scott Duckers and Fenner Brockway, both of them conscientious objectors, and in which the official Conservative candidate is being opposed, with much Conservative support, by Mr. Churchill.

It would appear that neither the Liberal nor the Labour candidate has any chance of winning the seat—let us hope that may be so—but there is obviously going to be a real fight between the old and the new Conservative. Mr. Churchill is being widely encouraged in the Press—particularly the Rothermere-Beaverbrook papers, which for the last election made the evacuation of Mesopotamia (the present policy for which Mr. Churchill originated) an important plank in their programme, are strenuously supporting him. From the thousands of voters who neither have conceived a severe dislike of Mr. Churchill nor have any political principles, the hopes of the ex-Lord of the Admiralty arise. There is certainly a broad disposition in the country generally that he should be returned to Parliament.

Mr. Churchill would, of course, be a godsend to the Conservatives. He has just that touch of imagination which is most conspicuously absent from their party. It is possible that he might revivify them: he would surely control them.

Singapore.

It is stated that, as far, at any rate, as this Government is concerned, the plans for the Singapore Dock are dead. The Prime Minister is in consultation with the Dominions on the matter; but it would seem that, whatever their reply, the Government has already made up its mind that the scheme is not to be realised. Thus ends the first instalment of the battle of words that has been going on for some time between the various experts. But it will assuredly break out again when the present Government comes to an end. Singapore is, I believe, the only place in the East where a large enough dock is feasible, and as the War grows more remote, opinion will probably veer round in favour of keeping up a strong display of naval power in the East.

Conservative Ideals.

The subject of the complete lack of ideals in the Conservative Party which has been on the lips of everybody for months past has at last reached the papers. Even The Times printed a letter from Sir Martin Conway which suggested that when the Conservative young men were willing to organise and to work as the young men of the Labour Party worked there was some chance of Conservatism's becoming once more a power in the land. To all but the very narrow party man the truth of all this is obvious, but there are still an appalling number of Conservative supporters who are content to jog along in the hope that their leaders will "evolve" a policy.

As if to emphasise their preference of machinery to ideals, the Unionist Party has chosen as chief organiser a man of enormous ability and possibly of practical genius, but it is at least open to doubt whether you can bring up to scratch constituencies as you can erring tube mechanics. Unionism, in its present condition, has not the slightest prospect of regaining the country; until it can show what is better than Socialism, until it can trust in principles rather than in men, it will progressively decay.

It is disgraceful that it should have been left to so old, comparatively speaking, a member as Sir Martin Conway to point out this truth.

The Budget Estimates.

In the Budget estimates which were published last week a probable total cut of 37 millions was shown. The main savings are to be on pensions, colonies, and the Middle East. Some of this saving will, of course, be pledged to fresh expenditure, and the rest Mr. Snowden will keep up his sleeve as the wherewithal to provide us a pleasant surprise. It is not to be thought, however, that there will be any reduction in the income-tax.

Most of the changes, including those concerning the Army and the Navy, were framed by the late Government. It is possible that the Government's Air estimates, which, at first sight, appear to be out of proportion to the estimates for the Army and Navy, will be vigorously challenged when they come up before the House.

The Ginger Group.

It is said that the "Ginger Group" of the Labour Party—a body of Left Socialists which acts as a liaison officer between the Party and the Government—is becoming fretful and discontented. Last week they voted against the Government on the second reading of the Trade Facilities Bill. But it is doubtful whether these honest Clydesiders seriously trouble Mr. MacDonald. Rather more worrying would appear to be the new group of trade union members, which is determined that the "intellectuals" of the party do not get any more of the plums. This grievance is a genuine one, on the remedying of which, however, the country would probably take fright.

The Howl of the Wireless.

Last week, for sweet variety's sake, the wireless people thought of the ingenious idea of broadcasting the howl of a dog. The result does not appear to have had any disastrous effects. On my own bulldog it produced no impression whatever; he slumbered sagely on through it all.

Winter's Come.

Winter's come, and, so it is nice to think, has gone. We have had our share of it this year, and it seems to have been very long making up its mind to go. But there is no doubt now that spring is in the air. An hour's walking in the March sunlight—the strongest of all our sunlights—and you can feel through the damp wintry varnish the close warm pulse of spring. Of course, we may have to look back, and the frosts at night certainly show that winter is making a hard fight "to avoid relegation," as the football papers say, but spring is bursting itself to attack, and one cannot believe that it will long be denied.

London's Musical Culture.

There were two events in London last week which ought to bring a blush to every Englishman's cheek. It is not everyone in England who has heard of Lionel Tertis, although everyone on the Continent and in America knows that he is incomparably the greatest viola player in the world. He decided a day or two ago to give a recital "with no free list," and the result was that sixty people turned up to hear him.

Again, John Coates, who is the finest tenor we have, confessed in a recital at Chelsea recently that out of a series of twenty-one concerts he had made a profit of £20. That was at Chelsea; in three concerts at Queen's Hall and the Central Hall he lost £416. It is all most pitiable, and one does indeed thank heaven that we have a Navy!

THE BYRON CENTENARY.

To the Editor of The Near East.

Sir,—On April 19 a hundred years ago Lord Byron died at Missolonghi in the service of the Greek nation. It has been suggested that no fitter testimony to his memory could be found than a special effort of practical assistance to the refugees in Greece who are in urgent need of succour. Of the million who were driven from their homes eighteen months ago there are not less than 500,000 who are still homeless, without adequate food and clothing, and an easy prey to hunger, exposure, and disease. The Refugee Settlement Commission of the League of Nations is at work on its schemes for their permanent settlement, but until financial aid for those schemes matures the refugees must largely be supported by private charity.

For £100 five hundred refugees can be fed for one month, and it is hoped that if sufficient funds are subscribed to this appeal a special memorial feeding centre could be opened in Greece.

Donations, which should be marked "Byron Memorial," should be sent to Sir Maurice Bonham Carter, K.C.B., Hon. Treasurer, Imperial War Relief Fund, General Buildings, Aldwych, London, W.C.2.—We are, etc.,

TRANSJORDANIA.

To the Editor of The Near East.

Sir,—Your report of my remarks at the Near and Middle East Association on February 15 contains several inaccuracies.

I did not say that Transjordania was the only hope of the Pan-Arab movement; I did not mention Col. Peake or the police; and though I hold no high opinion of the Hashimite family, I did not suggest that they were "wholly guided by monetary considerations."—I am, etc., Raglan.

Saint Jean-de-Luz, March 4.

[In regard to the first of Lord Raglan's corrections, we regret that the word "only" was wrongly inserted in the transcription of the report of his speech. As far as his other points are concerned, we should explain that the last sentences of our report did not pretend to reproduce his actual words, but were rather, owing to considerations of space, an attempt to sum up briefly his references and inferences.—Ed.]

MACEDONIA.

To the Editor of The Near East.

Sir,—I am asked to thank you for the reference which appeared in the last issue of The Near East, under "Notes of the Week," to our meeting on the Macedonian question.

Lord Thomson was asked, several weeks before he joined the Cabinet, to speak at this meeting as an expert on Balkan affairs, and consented to do so. A few days before the meeting took place he became a member of the Cabinet. In spite of heavy calls on his time, due to his new duties, he kindly agreed to keep his engagement to speak.

No one present at this meeting imagined for a moment that he was expressing the views of the present Government towards the Macedonian problem. It was perfectly well understood that he spoke as an experienced observer of conditions in the Balkans. Meanwhile, my Committee is so entirely in agreement with the last sentence in your note on Macedonia that I am asked to thank you on their behalf.

May I add that the Committee appreciates very much the accurate and interesting reports of our meetings which appear in The Near East?—I am, etc.,

G. N. W. Boffin, Secretary,

Cairo, March 2.

Egyptian Labour's Awakening.

Features hitherto unknown in Egyptian industrial disputes have marked a series of strikes in Alexandria factories during the past week. In some cases the men's decision to "down tools" has been merely the culminating act of protracted disagreement with the employers; in others it has been sudden and without the factory owners being aware that their employees had any grievance. But in each case there has been the same procedure on the part of the men. The factory has been occupied, the managers and foremen being turned out or imprisoned, and the men have refused to leave until their demands have been granted. Although on last Saturday the situation at the Filature Nationale Works was so threatening that the Government sent down to Alexandria one of the Under-Secretaries of State in the Ministry of the Interior with a body of troops and instructions to turn the strikers out by force if they would not go peaceably, neither in that particular instance nor in any of the others was it necessary to employ violent methods. The men were induced to leave the factories, and some sort of settlement has been made in each case, though nobody is very hopeful of the patched-up peace lasting very long. There has been another feature common to all these strikes—namely, the part played in them by a Maronite lawyer, Antoun Maroun by name, who has acted as intermediary between the men and their masters, and whose orders the former have apparently obeyed without question. The fact that Antoun Maroun is the secretary and moving spirit of the Egyptian Communist Party, which hitherto has not been taken seriously, has induced some of the local newspapers to come out with scare headlines about "Bolshevism in Alexandria," and articles calling upon the Government to take drastic measures to nip in the bud this first step towards Soviet Government in Egypt.

Disciples of Lenin.

This alarmist attitude on the part of a section of the Press is justified only to a very small extent. That Antoun Maroun and his party are Bolshevists at heart, and would like to see repeated in Egypt the experiment which has gained for Russia the epithet of Red, there is no doubt—they openly proclaim the fact. That they are in close touch with Moscow is also known, for a delegate from the party returned only a few weeks ago from the Russian capital, and his visit has been followed by the sending thither of two parties of children, or, anyhow, so the Arabic Press has said, to Communist schools in Russia. But that the majority, or any large number, of the workmen who have been concerned in the strikes of the past few days are in sympathy with Bolshevist doctrines, or even understand them, it is difficult to believe.

Labour Legislation Needed.

To anybody even slightly acquainted with the conditions prevailing in most factories in this country it is wonderful that there have not been serious industrial troubles long before this. Egypt, so far as the popular attitude towards labour is concerned, is in the position of the Great Britain of a hundred years ago. The conditions which Dickens described can be found in existence here to-day. The workman is regarded simply as a machine, from whom as much work as possible is to be extracted in return for the lowest possible wage. Legislation to protect the worker from exploitation, to ensure for him healthy and comfortable conditions, and to safeguard his interests in case of accident, or those of his dependents, should he be killed at his work, is non-existent. In these circumstances it is no wonder that a man like Antoun Maroun has been able to get the Alexandrian factory hands to go on strike and take him for their leader. But Bolshevist at heart Egyptian working men certainly are not, and, if the Government will realise the urgent necessity for protecting the labouring classes from exploitation, there is little fear of Communism gaining much hold. On the other hand, unless industrial problems are tackled quickly and intelligently there is every prospect of Alexandria, ever a city known for its turbulence, developing into a second Barcelona. It is unfortunate that there is not in the present Government anybody who knows anything at all about industrial questions, but this lack will not matter so much if the Ministry, realising its own ignorance of such matters, will call in the assistance of foreign experts, who appreciate the urgent necessity of remedying the appalling conditions in which Egyptian workmen now earn their living.

The Tutankhamen Tomb Dispute.

Great preparations are being made for the official reopening of the tomb on Thursday next, for which the Egyptian Government is issuing a large number of invitations. Two steamers have been ordered to Luxor for the accommodation of Ministers and their families, while ninety rooms have been reserved at the Winter Palace Hotel for guests of the Government. The hotel, booked up for weeks ahead, is finding some difficulty in making arrangements for this sudden new influx, and there has been a certain amount of breeziness between the management and the Government. When the order for the ninety rooms was first received, a reply was sent that it would be met as far as possible, but when a second message requested a plan of the hotel, so that the Ministry of Public Works might choose which rooms it required, private guests, it being intimated, to be turned out where necessary, the manager felt it time to point out that, although the Ministry might be in absolute control on the other side of the river, they did not enjoy the same authority in his hotel, and visitors who had already been allotted certain rooms could not be turned out of them for the Government or anybody else.

The Drug Traffic.

At last, it seems, the Government has awakened to the menace of the drug traffic, which, during the last two or three years, has been carried on almost openly under the eyes of the police, who have been powerless to stop it because Egyptian judges would not take a serious view of the trade, and when sellers of cocaine have been caught red-handed have let them off with fines of twenty or thirty piastres. The Commandant of Police in Cairo has declared over and over again that, given adequate penalties, his force could stop three-quarters of the drug trafficking in twelve months. Now two committees are to be appointed, one to examine the question of drug trafficking as a whole, and the second to report on means of securing stricter control of pharmacies, many of which, as everybody, including the police, knows, will sell cocaine and morphine to anyone who wants it and has the money to pay the prices asked.

Control of Prostitution.

Allied to the traffic in drugs is the problem of prostitution, for there is little doubt that drug-taking in Egypt has been spread through the brothels. Existing methods of controlling prostitution have come into the limelight through the arrest of the notorious Ibrahim el Gharbi, the richest brothel-owner in the country, and the centre of the business whereby houses of ill-fame are kept supplied with girls. In Egypt prostitution is recognised by the State, and prostitutes are supposed to be registered and medically inspected at regular intervals. But the control which exists in theory has in practice become such a farce that opinion is growing in favour of abolition of control rather than that the State should appear to lend countenance to the abuses which have crept in. Under martial law the exceptional powers given to the police enabled them to exercise some sort of supervision on houses of ill-fame, but now, with the ridiculously inadequate legislation which exists, complicated by the existence of the Capitulations, the police are powerless. It is well known that the majority of prostitutes are not registered at all, while even a registered woman has the greatest ease in avoiding the medical examination. Even if she does not report for examination for four months together, she is only fined P.T.20. The police know well hundreds of unlicensed prostitutes and where they carry on their business, but cannot interfere unless the women's neighbours complain. These are only a few of the many existing anomalies which make the supposed control ineffective. On the face of it, it would seem better to abolish a purely nominal control, which everybody knows to be a farce, and which brings the law and the police into disrepute. Were there in Egypt any sort of public opinion which would keep prostitution within decent bounds without police supervision, it would certainly be better to abolish control, but in a country like this, where there is no real public opinion at all, it is a question whether even the present abuses are not preferable to the state of things which would exist were supervision—even of the present imperfect kind—abolished altogether.

The Khalifate.

The bomb has gone off since I wrote a week ago in an atmosphere of expectancy. The scene was not staged as well as it might have been, for there were several premature attempts at raising the curtain, and even now one is not allowed to know quite all that is intended to be done.

There are two principal questions en jeu—the fate of the Khalif and of the other members of the ex-Imperial family, and the fate of the institution, the Khalifate. As far as the first question is concerned, there does not appear to be any doubt that the Assembly, as the source of legislative and executive measures in the Republic of Turkey, has a perfect right to take any measures it pleases with regard to the ex-Imperial family within the limits of justice and decency. Presumably, also, as the present Khalif has never been more than the puppet of the National Assembly, and his nomination to the post of Khalif was made without the participation of the rest of the Moslem world, the National Assembly is again within its rights in withdrawing from Abdul Medjid Effendi the Khalifial dignity. The second and more important question—the fate of the Khalifate—is not so simple, and at the time of writing no definite public decision has been taken upon it. The intention of the Turkish Government is to decree the abolition of the institution of the Khalifate. At the meeting of the Assembly on March 2, the Minister of Justice, Seid Bey, who is said to be a learned ecclesiastical lawyer, brought forward a number of arguments, based on the early history of Islam, on the Koran itself, and on the Hadith, to show that from the religious point of view there is no need of a Khalif at all. He maintained that the Koran enjoins obedience to God, the Prophet, and those who govern. The meaning of the term is merely Successor—i.e., of the Prophet, and that the nomination of a Khalif is not an indispensable condition of the Moslem religious organism he illustrates by the fact that the Prophet himself made no provision for such an office; the first Khalif, Abou Bekr, was chosen after the Prophet's death by his entourage, and after the death of Omar, the second Khalif, a council of six persons elected Osman. He concluded his arguments by the statement that from the religious point of view there was no objection to the abolition of the office, and from the political point of view it was purely a matter for the decision of the Assembly. Neither of these arguments is likely to be accepted as valid by the Moslem world as a whole, for a pronouncement of the Turkish National Assembly on a matter of religion can hardly be considered as binding on non-Turks who form the overwhelming majority of Moslems, and the conclusion that the political aspect of the Khalifate concerns no one but the Turks can be effectively countered by the statement that the Khalifate is not, and never was, an exclusively Turkish institution.

All this argumentation is, however, of little practical value, for it is certain that to-day or to-morrow the Assembly will have passed by a comfortable majority the law which purports to abolish the Khalifate. Who of all the eligible personages in the Islamic world will claim or acquire the dignity rejected by the Turks it cannot yet be foreseen. There remains the possibility of piquant developments when the further intentions of the Government are known concerning the organism which is destined to replace the present Khalifate. Two solutions have been discussed: the total abolition of the institution, as far as Turkey is concerned. This would transfer the whole of religious property, including the relics transferred during the War from the Hejaz, to the Turkish State, and entail the administration of religious affairs by a functionary appointed by Angora to replace the Minister of Cults, who is to disappear from the Cabinet. This solution is the logical conclusion of the arguments adduced by the Minister of Justice in his speech. The alternative would be the attribution to the Assembly, or a person or persons delegated by it, of the Khalifial powers and dignities. To judge from the various papers, it would seem that the more liberal and advanced section of the Assembly stands for the former plan, whereas the Conservatives are making a virtue of necessity and trying to persuade the President of the Republic to assume the post as the representative of the nation. According to the Tevhid, Mustapha Kemal, yielding to the pressure of the party, has definitely refused to consider the suggestion of assuming the office.

Other Changes.

The importance of this part of the resounding reforms which have just been introduced has relegated to the background other facets and details of the changes. Not only has the Ministry of Cults been excluded from the Cabinet, but also the Chief of the General Staff, in order to divorce from politics the internal administration of the Army. This is undoubtedly a sound move; the presence of the Minister of National Defence in the Cabinet is sufficient for all purposes connected with military policy, and in no civilised country is it found necessary to involve the technical head of the Army in a purely political atmosphere.

Another aspect of the reforms, on which it is perhaps premature to make any hasty predictions, is the effect upon the balance of political parties. It has been assumed for some time that Mustapha Kemal Pasha has recently made up his quarrel with some of the prominent Unionists, and come round to their point of view that new blood is wanted in the Cabinet and in the Administration, which limps terribly. Reports are current that at Smyrna a bargain was struck with the Unionists that they should support and prepare public opinion for the reforms, in exchange for certain posts in a reconstructed Ministry. Now that they have faithfully fulfilled their part of the bargain, and the new order of things is safely launched, one is informed that Ismet Pasha remains in power, and inspired prognostications about the names of those who are expected to fill future Ministerial posts appear to show that the favoured candidates are not Unionists but extreme Nationalist henchmen of Mustapha Kemal. The marked detachment of Refet Pasha and Reouf Bey from affairs in Angora can be, and is, interpreted only in one sense, and there is some reason to suppose that the Unionist leaders are preparing to make themselves unpleasant. It is a thousand pities, for just at this moment there is an excellent chance of uniting the two wings of the Liberal movement for the good of the country. If that is not done soon, and some radical steps taken for the improvement of the Administration, all the well-meant enthusiasm for the modernisation and the development of Turkey may evaporate in the smoke of party quarrels, and a return be made to the Hamidian régime under another name.

ALBANIA.

Tirana, March 4.

The Late Government.

Although the international situation of Albania may be considered stronger now than at any previous time, the internal situation is not so satisfactory.

Ahmet Bey Zogu, who has been defeated in the recent elections, has led the Government since March, 1922. He certainly deserves credit for completely restoring order in the country—it is quite safe now for travellers to visit any part of Albania—but his prestige had latterly greatly diminished. The finances of the country are still in an unsound condition, and the Administration remains incompetent, to say the least. In addition to the ex-Premier, three of his Ministers were defeated at the elections, and his personal following has been returned in diminished numbers. Yet he has failed to realise how untenable his position has become. Zogu is a young mountain chief only just turned thirty, of great intelligence and energy; but his judgment is warped by ambition and lack of education. If he retired altogether for a few years and gave his time to study he would be doing the best for himself and for his country, which would certainly call him again into its service before long. Perhaps it needed the dastardly attempt on his life recently to persuade him that he could no longer hope to retain the office of Prime Minister without plunging his country into armed strife. Thus the prolonged ministerial crisis, open ever since Parliament assembled on January 21, has been provisionally resolved—hardly, however, in a manner which inspires much confidence in the stability of the solution.

The New Government.

The new Prime Minister, Shefqet Bey Verlazi, is the presumptive father-in-law of the retiring Prime Minister, Ahmet Bey Zogu. He is a great landowner from Elbasan, and is reputed to be the richest man in Albania. He represents the conservative interests of the big quasi-feudal Beys, and, as a member of what is known as the "Clique" (a political group composed of landed proprietors, chiefs, and ex-Turkish officials whose interests lie in preserving the social status quo), is not looked upon with favour by the more influential leaders of the army and gendarmerie. Since the military play an important part in Albanian politics, this fact alone renders a prolonged life of the new Ministry somewhat doubtful.

Zogu retires behind the scenes, but will continue to exercise considerable influence in the direction of affairs. The new Ministry is, in fact, an attempt on the part of Zogu—whose political fortunes depend at present on an understanding with the Clique (and vice-versa)—to retain as much power as possible.

The new Ministry has obtained a vote of confidence by 53 votes against 26; but there were 25 abstentions. Nevertheless, 53 does represent, however barely, an absolute majority in the Chamber. The moderating influence in the Cabinet is that of Elias Bey Vrioni, a former Prime Minister, now Minister of Foreign Affairs. His inclusion is the real guarantee of such stability as the new Ministry possesses; for, though he stands for the Bey interests, he is a man of conciliatory views, and is respected as an unquestionably honest man, and as a patriot by all parties indiscriminately, inside and outside Parliament.

Colonel Mustafa Aranita, Minister of War, is not a deputy, having been defeated at the last elections; but, according to the terms of the provisional Constitution, it is not necessary for a Minister to be a deputy. He was War Minister in the late Cabinet, and is a member of the Clique; he may, therefore, be regarded as a supporter of Zogu, at least in so far as he represents in the army that section opposed to the majority who are against the Clique and view Zogu with distrust. The authority which he can wield from the War Office acts accordingly as a restraining influence on any active opposition on the part of the army and gendarmerie to the forces at present in power.

In this connection it is interesting to note that the formation of a coalition Ministry under Elias Bey Vrioni, with the democratic leaders, Bishop Fan Noli and M. Gurakuqi, included, only failed to come into being last week owing to the refusal of the latter to accept Colonel Aranita as Minister of War, and to the refusal by Zogu and the Clique to accede to any neutral army leader being appointed in his place. This shows how strongly the latter feel that they cannot afford to lose the support of the War Office as at present constituted, and how anxious are the Democrats to neutralise the War Office in order to have the support of the army and gendarmerie untrammelled. All this signifies a rather dangerous state of instability, a situation the essence of which lies in the contrast of interests between the vested power of the quasi-feudal landowning class (backed up by other elements with vested interests) and the claims of the rising professional classes, complicated by powerful personal issues—e.g., the ambition and jealousy of individuals—while the simple mountaineer and the peasant, who form the bulk of the population, are not sufficiently educated politically to do more than follow, according to local circumstances, the dictates of their hearts—e.g., respect or hatred of their local bosses as the case may be.

The remaining members of the new Cabinet are M. Mufid Libohova, Minister of Justice, and M. Kocho Kotta, Minister of Public Works, who, pending further appointments, will also preside ad interim over the Ministries of Public Instruction and Finance.

The latter is an orthodox Christian from Koritza, and is an adherent of Zogu. The former has been Minister of Justice before. He is heartily disliked by the Nationalists (the bulk of whom form the extreme wing of the Democratic Party), not because he is an ardent Italophil, but because, when Albania was virtually at war with Italy (in the summer of 1920, following the Congress of Lushnia), his continued close relations with Italy made him a traitor in their eyes. This view, given the circumstances, is, of course, a gross exaggeration; but his presence in the Ministry will serve to engender heat, and should strengthen the hands of the Opposition rather than bring the Ministry strength. He was educated at Constantinople, held various administrative and consular posts under the Sultan, was one of Ishmael Kemal Bey's Liberal following in the Turkish Parliament after the Young Turk revolution, and is a member of the "Clique."

The new Ministry promises a political amnesty (a concession to the Democrats) and a vigorous financial policy. M. Eshref Frasheri has been re-elected President of the Chamber, and no better man could have been selected for this delicate post.

Ultimate Hopes.

Thus the present history of Albania resembles that of many other countries at the time when their feudal and clan institutions were giving way before the rise of a professional class. So long, therefore, as the country is sheltered from external aggression, or as long as patriotism makes, as it does in Albania, an appeal strong enough to cause leaders to forget their differences in times of national emergency, there is no valid reason to suppose that the Albanians will fail to evolve for themselves all in good time a stable social asset. They are unquestionably a politically gifted people, endowed with an exceptionally quick intelligence, together with that important corrective of intelligence, a sense of humour. Friends of Albania, however they may view the present situation with anxiety, need not give way to pessimism.

Albania and Italy.

A Supplementary Treaty to the Italo-Albanian Commercial Treaty, dealing with the Consular services and property rights, was signed last week in Rome. Signor Mussolini made the following pointed remark when shaking hands, after signing the Treaty, with Dr. Tewfik Mborja, Albanian Chargé d'Affaires:—"Believe me, I am a sincere friend of Albania, and you will see that I mean what I say, for I mean to give you proofs of it."

THE INDIAN BUDGET.

The Legislative Assembly has not, as we write, grappled with the details of the Budget which was presented on the last day of February, but the preliminary discussions have gone sufficiently far to afford an indication of the extent of the changes which the last few years have brought about. Formerly we looked to the Financial Member to produce first of all a clear account of the economic condition of the country, and then to indicate the legislative and administrative measures called for by the situation. These announcements having been made, time was given for a deluge of ineffective verbiage; possibly a few trivial concessions were made to what passed for public opinion, and then the Government proceeded to carry out its plans. To-day there is a genuine political element, which formerly was wanting, and we find that important administrative changes, and what is even more striking, the disposal of a substantial surplus, are to be left in the hands of a legislature composed largely of inexperienced politicians, and, taken as a whole, very imperfectly qualified to appreciate the questions at issue. To say this is not to condemn the change which has been brought about so rapidly. On the contrary, we welcome it unreservedly, because a country which aims at self-government must learn first of all how to manage its own finances, and its legislators must get into the habit of assuming direct responsibility for the taxes levied from the people at large. We insist on the magnitude and rapidity of the change, because it is our justification for paying more attention to politics, and less to finance, than has been usual in discussing the budgets of former years.

Apart, indeed, from its political aspect, the present Budget calls for comparatively little comment. The facts and figures laid before the legislature show that in the departments of production and commerce the country has made very substantial progress towards regaining the position which it held before the War. There is again a large surplus of goods available for export, and, with a partial recovery of buying power in foreign markets, India is once more able to meet all her liabilities to the rest of the world, and still claim a large balance, most of which she is at present wasting on superfluous jewellery. It follows almost necessarily that the revenue expected by the Government for the coming year is more than sufficient to cover expenditure calculated on the penurious scale which rules in India, and thus the new legislature can be given an opportunity of deciding how the surplus revenue shall be applied. The position then shows a marked improvement, but it cannot yet be described as satisfactory. Much urgent expenditure has been indefinitely postponed, uncovered liabilities are looming ahead, and what is now wanted is an assurance that revenues, both central and provincial, shall show a progressive increase sufficient in amount to bring the administration abreast of modern requirements. In other words, we want to be sure that the income earned by the people, which at present falls far short of what is possible, gives promise of expanding quickly enough to yield the additional revenue which the Administration requires. On this question the Budget statement, as published in this country, throws but little light, and the one hopeful fact which it discloses is the effective entry of the small investor on the scene. During the current year the Post Office alone has collected in small sums a larger amount of capital than ten years ago could be obtained from all the money markets of India, and, if this movement should happily continue to develop, the financial future of the country would be almost assured, for then the surplus income of the people would at last find profitable employment instead of being wasted or retained in unproductive forms, and a vast cumulative force would come into operation, which would eventually go far to make India rich instead of poor. It is too soon yet to determine whether or not the small investor has come to stay, but now that the Administration has shown that his value is appreciated, it may be hoped, at least, that nothing will be left undone to make him feel comfortable and secure.

The question of the disposal of the surplus is, however, the most interesting topic of the moment. There are two claimants: on one side the taxpayers as a body, who are represented as demanding a reduction of the duty on salt; on the other, the provincial Governments, anxious for money to get on with the work of nation-building which, under the existing Constitution, falls mainly on their shoulders. Politics apart, the provinces have certainly the better claims. The contributions which they make towards central expenditure were never intended to be permanent. They represent a temporary arrangement, to be got rid of as soon as ever the Central Government can pay its way. They are substantial in amount, they are a blot on the financial system, and, what is much worse, they constitute a running sore, threatening to produce dangerous tension between authorities whose harmony is essential to national progress. Sooner or later they must be abolished, and, if the question were one of pure finance, there can be no doubt that every surplus as it accrues should be devoted to their gradual extinction. Many of the legislators, however, stand committed by what they must now realise was the precipitate folly of last year's outcry against the enhancement of the salt tax, and, judging from the preliminary debate, they will insist on the entire enhancement being remitted, though that course leaves nothing for the provinces, and involves a threat of possible further taxation a year or two ahead. Their attitude is, in our opinion, unstatesmanlike, but nevertheless we think the Central Government has acted correctly in leaving the question to their decision. Politics can be learned only by practice, and in the early stages a certain amount of risk must be incurred. The test now imposed on the legislature is perhaps rather severe for a class which, after all, is only in the lower primary stage of its political education, and we do not expect that the pupils will rise fully to the occasion; but the harm done by a wrong answer will not be irreparable, and the near future will show whether Indian legislators are developing the essential quality of ability to learn from their own mistakes. We shall sympathise with the provinces if their reasonable claims are postponed, but in that case they also will have the opportunity of learning an important lesson, the lesson that in the new conditions they must cease to be suppliants to the powers above them, but rather put their own shoulder to the wheel, and themselves raise the money which they regard as indispensable to their progress.

THE "BLUE PETER."

Although there is little in the March issue of "Blue Peter" that closely concerns Near and Middle Eastern regions, its contents, especially its illustrations, are as interesting as ever. In particular there is an entrancing Spurling picture of the "Cutty Sark," which stirs the imagination of sea-travellers as no amount of text could.

THE MACEDONIAN DANGER.

With the League of Nations in existence, intended primarily for the settlement of questions that two or more nations find it impossible to settle direct, it becomes more and more amazing that the Powers of Europe should allow the Macedonian danger to come to a head without making any effort to remove it before the peace of the Continent has been disturbed. Appeals have been made by Bulgaria both to the Great Powers and to the Council of the League for an inquiry into the Macedonian question; but so far no action has been taken in the matter. There is no desire in Great Britain to take sides against Yugoslavia in this controversy. It would, however, be idle to pretend that the Yugoslav contention that there is no Macedonian question carries conviction with it, in the face of what is taking place in that part of the world. It is Yugoslavia and no other country that is having trouble with the Macedonians, and it is she that is threatening to make this very question a casus belli against Bulgaria. We are not concerned here with the merits of the controversy or with the arguments urged on either side. As is well known, both parties can score points in any analysis of the past. It is with the present actual conditions that Europe has to deal, if the peace of the Balkans is to be maintained. Yugoslavia has had a free hand in settling her Montenegrin difficulties; but on her own acknowledgment she is unable to cope with the Macedonians without embroiling a third party. Bulgaria may not be free from blame. The greater, however, her responsibility the stronger the reason for an international inquiry. As a member of the League of Nations, Yugoslavia has no right to proceed to acts of war—it can hardly be a question of war in the accepted sense of the word, as the Bulgarians can be no match to-day for Yugoslavia—until she has availed herself of the services of the League in the cause of peace. We believe that there is a body of opinion in Yugoslavia which holds it to be expedient that Serbs and Bulgarians should live side by side in peace and brotherhood; but it is difficult to see how this end can be attained until a settlement of the Macedonian question has been reached. Such a settlement will be in no way inimical to Yugoslav interests. It is protested in some circles that Macedonia has been made part of Yugoslavia, and that, therefore, anything happening in that region is a domestic concern of the Yugoslavs. This argument is shown to be worthless by the attempt to make Bulgaria responsible for Yugoslav difficulties. A question in which a third party is implicated can no longer be regarded as the domestic concern of one country. With good will on the part of all concerned, we believe that a settlement might be reached by negotiations between the three parties; but if, as the exponent of the Yugoslav point of view suggested in these pages a few weeks ago, the Belgrade Government cannot bring itself to negotiate with Todor Alexandroff, the Macedonian leader, then an international inquiry alone is likely to be able to settle the controversy.

Some sympathy can be felt with the Serbians in their disappointment, after so many years of propaganda, at finding that when at last Macedonia is formally incorporated in Serbia, the inhabitants will not acquiesce in the position. The best advice, however, that can be given them is that they should accept the situation as philosophically as the British have their experience in Ireland. There is no reason why Macedonia should not become an integral part of Yugoslavia, but a settlement must be sought which will bring the Macedonians willingly within the Yugoslav federation, and not seek to force them into it in their despite. Macedonia, under existing conditions, can only be a source of weakness to Yugoslavia. Ruthless administration might hope to keep the malcontents in Southern Serbia in permanent subjection; yet the inclusion of the district within Yugoslavia can bring no material advantage to the latter, and the hatred of a quarter of a million or more Macedonians domiciled in Bulgaria must remain a constant menace beyond the Yugoslav frontier. Can there be the least doubt in these circumstances that the Yugoslav Government ought to make every effort to obtain a settlement by consent, which will keep the Macedonians within the Yugoslav federation and convert them into an element of real strength for the kingdom—a replica of what the Transvaal has become in the British Empire?

It might be better—it would certainly be more flattering to the amour propre of Yugoslavia—if she could settle the Macedonian question on these lines without outside help. A serious obstacle, however, exists in the internal political situation. M. Raditch has threatened to use Macedonia as a stick with which to beat the Pashitch Government. It will be a temptation, therefore, to the latter, especially at a moment when the Croatian leader proposes to make use of his strength in the Skupshtina, to try to thwart his designs by making Macedonia the occasion and jumping-off place for a popular attack on Bulgaria. Thereafter there could be no settlement by consent; the Macedonians would see to that, and Yugoslavia, whatever territorial or economic advantages she might gain on paper, would know little peace on her south-eastern borders. On the other hand, there can be no doubt of the sincerity of Bulgaria's desire to avoid all provocation of Yugoslavia. It requires some courage on the part of a Bulgarian Government to carry through arrests of Macedonians on a large scale, and only the dread of further disasters for the country will have steeled the members of the Cabinet to risk their own personal safety in the interest of Bulgaria as a whole. If the Yugoslav Government could free itself for a short space of time from the old prejudice against the Bulgarians—no matter what justification may be claimed for it from the past—it must recognise that the moment is ripe for an attempt to bring about a permanent settlement in the Balkans. One item in the long indictment brought by the Croatians against the Government of M. Pashitch is that it is really a military junta masquerading under constitutionalism, which is using Bulgaria as an excuse for saddling Yugoslavia with unnecessary military burdens. A generous gesture in response to the action of the Bulgarian Government in arresting Macedonian agitators would cut away much of the ground from under M. Raditch's feet far more effectually than a hostile movement against Bulgaria, for which there can now be no adequate excuse.

BRITAIN AND INDIA.

Sir George Lloyd on the Partnership Problem.

On the occasion of a luncheon given by the British Indian Union on March 6, to bid farewell to Viscount and Lady Goschen prior to their departure for Madras, and to welcome Sir George Lloyd and the Hon. Lady Lloyd on their return from India, Sir George Lloyd made the following speech :—

We are witnessing in India to-day the multitudinous expression of a clash of differing opinions, and whilst this may seem at times to ruffle almost unduly the great sea of India's political and national emotions, it may perhaps be that England is serving India best by giving her that wonderful opportunity which she has never before had, and could not have under the ægis of any other authority—the opportunity of giving some expression to these emotions, and of testing under the shadow of our secure protection the real temperature and swiftness of those political torrents in which some of the most ardent zealots are already confident that they have the strength to swim.

It is, I think, however, clear that, if that great constitutional experiment embodied in the Montagu-Chelmsford Reform Act is to succeed, it can only be by prudence, patience, and a realisation of the singular difficulties of India's problem. For India is not one country, any more than Europe is one country : it is composed of many nations, many languages, and many diverse creeds. The vast majority of its people are still unable to read or write, and to hope that an area so circumstanced can in the space of a few brief years attain to the full stature of constitutional development is obviously unreasonable. Before that can be realised the electors, if the democracy is not to be a mere sham, must be sufficiently educated to form some ideas of the issues on which they vote and thus maintain proper control over the legislatures. It was in realisation of this inevitable truth that the Bombay Government recently led the way in India by passing an Act for free and compulsory education throughout Western India.

The Unwisdom of Haste.

Perhaps the greatest difficulty that confronts an administrator in India to-day is to make those who are the leaders of political thought there understand that he who rashly, or in a moment of enthusiasm, presses down the accelerator of these movements is not a real or courageous friend of constitutional progress, and that they would be wiser to trust those who have tried in times of difficulty and anxiety to honour the full letter and the full spirit of the Reforms Act. They can sympathise with, without always yielding to, the demands of enthusiasts, and by gradually building up a tradition, by patience and by counsel, they can bring these ideas—so novel as they are to the people—naturally into the daily practice of their lives. Those who do this are they, as I believe, who are the staunch friends and pilots of India's new status and being. We in this country have for so many centuries become accustomed to drink the wine of constitutional liberty that we are apt, I think, sometimes to forget how heady a beverage it is to those less accustomed to its taste.

May we not remember, too, that in any partnership, be it commercial, political, or constitutional, each of the partners must bring something to the common stock. We bring to India our affection, our protection, the great heritage of our prestige, and, above all, our age-long and well-tried knowledge of constitutional growth and practice. India brings to us many things too in return : her art, her culture, her history, and the infinite loyalty of her myriad peoples. But may we not at this juncture ask for one thing more from India's political leaders—namely, for that trust and confidence in us that we really do mean to do for her what we have set out to do, that out of this trust may grow that patience and co-operation with us in our common task which alone can bring the success which we mutually desire?

A Tribute to the Indian Civil Service.

Nothing has interested me more in my five years of stewardship than my personal contact, on the one hand, with the zeal and idealism of some of India's political leaders, and, on the other, with that splendid band of public servants who, generation after generation, and year after year, Britain has sent out to administer and foster the spirit of liberty in India. In my judgment it is largely due to their steadfastness in difficulty, their patience in misunderstanding, their unfailing sympathy with the people, and their brilliant abilities that the inauguration of the reforms has been made possible and that their working has been maintained. Is it too much to hope that with a greater measure of co-operation between such elements as these the future of India may fulfil the hopes and aspirations of all who, like myself, care deeply for India's happiness, content and progress within the British Empire?

THE BRITISH-INDIAN UNION.

A luncheon was given at the Hotel Cecil on March 6 by the British-Indian Union to bid farewell to Viscount Goschen, Governor-Designate of Madras, and Lady Goschen, prior to their departure for India, and to welcome home Sir George Lloyd, former Governor of Bombay, and the Hon. Lady Lloyd. Viscount Erleigh, Chairman of the Executive Committee, presided, and among those present, in addition to the guests of honour, were : The Countess of Hardwicke, Viscountess Erleigh, Kathleen Viscountess Falmouth, the Hon. Emily Kinnaird, the Lady Jane Lindsay, Sir Edward and Lady Boyle, the Dowager Lady Boyle, Sir Thomas Bennett, Sir D. M. Dalal, Sir Krishna Gupta, Sir John Heaton, Sir Malcolm Hogg, Sir Ali and Lady Imam, Lady McMahon, Lt.-Colonel R. K. Mitter, Major Graham Pole, Sir Stanley and Lady Reed, Sir James Roberts, Dewan Bahadur Acharya, Mr. R. K. Sorabji, Miss Cornelia Sorabji, Rao Bahadur Sunderachorlu, and Rao Bahadur Mitra.

Before proposing the health of the guests, Lord Erleigh spoke of the objects of the Union, founded a year ago, of which the Duke of Connaught is President, and reminded the members present that the Union had a special task before it this year in helping Indian visitors to the Empire Exhibition.

In replying to the toast of his health, Lord Goschen thanked them for their good wishes, which were offered by those who had knowledge of what confronted the recipients of the toast, and which expressed the understanding sympathy of the new life that was before him. He said that he found in his travels in various parts of the Empire that he was often asked whether the people at home were interested in and had a real knowledge of the questions that exercised overseas communities. The point was whether the people of these islands had the vision to understand not only the vital importance, but also the working and the daily progress of great questions which were affecting us at home as well as those living in the countries where they were being treated. Lady Goschen and he were going out to Madras with the desire to give of their best in their respective spheres—for the work of Lady Lloyd in Bombay had shown that there was a sphere of beneficent achievement for the wife of a Governor. India appealed to the imagination by reason of its history, its beauty, and its teeming millions. Its memories were an inspiration as they set out on a new life. He recognised that there were great responsibilities in the life that lay before them, but they believed that these could best be approached in the remembrance that besides and beyond policies and measures, of any race, creed, and class, they must come down to the human factor and help to maintain cordial relations with those who were dealing with India's great problems.

The speech made by Sir George Lloyd in reply to the toast is given on the preceding page.

ROYAL GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY.

Among the recipients of the award of the Royal Medals of the Royal Geographical Society which the King has been pleased to approve are:—Ahmed Hassanein Bey (the Founders' Medal), for his journey in 1923 to Kufra and Darfur and Major A. L. Holt (the Gill Memorial), for his surveys in Arabia.

NEWS IN BRIEF.

It is proposed to set aside the Yildiz Kiosk, the palace erected by the Sultan Abdul Hamid at Constantinople, as the residence of Mustapha Kemal Pasha.

The death is reported from Athens on March 9 of General Danglis, who was a member of the Salonika Triumvirate with M. Venizelos and Admiral Kondouriotis, the present Regent.

According to Reuter, Sir Percy Loraine, British Minister at Teheran, has left for England on six months' leave of absence. He will travel via Russia, and will be the first Englishman to use this route from Persia since the War.

A message received in Rome from Tirana states that, the Albanian Cabinet having resigned, the Ministry has been reconstituted as follows:—President and Minister for the Interior, Shefket Verlazi; Minister for Foreign Affairs, M. Vrioni.

A Delhi message says that the Committee to deal with the status of Indians in the Colonies will consist of the Aga Khan, Mr. Rangachariar, and Mr. K. C. Roy, who will sail on the 15th inst. The other members will be Sir Benjamin Robertson and Mr. J. Hope Simpson, M.P.

The research expedition of the Xenia Seminary of St. Louis and the American School of Archæology in Jerusalem, which set out in search of Sodom and Gomorrah, has just returned from an expedition around the Dead Sea. The explorers report successful and interesting finds.

A Karachi message states that while Flying Officer Oliver Carter and Observer Officer Wilfred Chase, both of No. 27 Squadron, Risalpur, were engaged in a practice flight on March 7 their machine caught fire in the air. They succeeded in landing safely, but not before the pilot had been badly burned.

INDIAN SCULPTURE.

"EXAMPLES OF INDIAN SCULPTURE AT THE BRITISH MUSEUM." (The India Society, 3, Victoria Street, London. 30s. net.)

It will be best to get over at once our grumble about this in many ways excellent book. It consists of twelve pages of text and twelve photographs bound in paper boards. Why, then, should it be put into a world containing many potential interested readers at a price (30s. net) which makes it utterly impossible for most of them to possess it? We trust that the India Society will bear this in mind in its future publications.

The photographs are excellent and are beautifully reproduced by the collotype process. The selection is, in the small space made available, probably as good as could have been made. It was probably a pity, with only twelve plates available, not to concentrate on stone sculpture alone, or on bronze castings alone. Nine plates to one art and three to the other emphasise the quantitative inadequacy of the illustrations. Mr. Rothenstein's introduction, if not very informative nor betraying any deep knowledge of the subject, is, at all events, useful and readable. If only the book had been issued at a price which would have taken it into general use it would certainly have had the effect—which no doubt was desired—of inducing many students of art more or less ignorant of the merits of Indian sculpture to visit and examine the treasures of that art which we have available at our doors in the British Museum.

DOMESTICATING CLEOPATRA.

"THE LIFE AND TIMES OF CLEOPATRA, QUEEN OF EGYPT." By Arthur Weigall. (London: Thornton Butterworth, Ltd. 21s. net.)

Whether Walter Scott is history or History is only Walter Scott has long been relegated to the cupboard of silly conundrums. The answer is, of course, "in the affirmative," and this "Life and Times of Cleopatra" may serve as our Q.E.D.; for the world knows as much of the real Amy Robsart and of the real Anne of Geierstein as it does of the real Cleopatra. But this has not satisfied Mr. Arthur Weigall. History, Clio herself, is too harsh and too dull for his poetic sense. Why should there be gaps in the life and times of so famous a person as the levanting Cleopatra? Surely, if she was Queen of Egypt in the days of the hungry first Cæsars there could have been no gaps in her life, no Joshuas in her suncourses! She led a full life—indeed, we hardly needed Mr. Weigall to teach us that; she led a very ordinary, a relatively humdrum life—here is where our poetic author innovates; he is not only a filler of ditches, he is a gallant white-washer of Julia. Listen to this (p. 87): "One may almost picture her making faces at her brother (Ptolemy XIV.) as they sat opposite one another in Cæsar's improvised court of justice, and the unhappy boy's distress must have been acute"; or (p. 114): "It would seem he (Cæsar) had already sent messengers to Cleopatra, who had spent a quiet year of maternal interests in Alexandria, to tell her to come with her baby to Rome." "The Life and Times of Cleopatra" is full of such happy home touches—we have picked merely two at random; why, therefore, wrangle upon the difference between history and novel-writing when we have here, served up hot, the Home-Journal-ease of the Daily Mail. Are we reading history or are we reading Walter Scott? Nay! We have before us, and in a revised edition, nothing half so serious; it is not even Shakespeare—stay, we have it—it is Baron Munchausen embroidering Plutarch.

We may say outright that we cannot swallow Mr. Weigall's Cleopatra; his gold is altogether too gilded; he has debased it; he commits the unpardonable; he paints the lily. Cleopatra, our own history-book tells us, had a son by Julius Cæsar and one by Anthony; she never had "a baby"; our history-book says she was a considerable improvement upon Theodora; we will not have her as a glorified housemaid, allowed only "one day off" in the week; our history-book admits very long gaps in her life; we turn to Mr. Weigall, and we learn that she is thinking hard in the nursery all these times. When her mind is entirely vacant and the new historian is at a loss, we have most elaborately expanded pictures of Cæsar maudlin and of Anthony drunk. And lest our author's appealing peroration should deflect any of our humour, we remember, as we close the book, that our new Cleopatra has dark eyes on page 77 and keen grey eyes on page 112; and finally, except as a dutiful reviewer, we must refuse to read several consecutive pages of imaginary conversations (in prose) between Cleopatra and Anthony, drunk or sober. Not that "the little Queen," as the author insists on calling her, was ever guilty of inebriety. He is sure that she was a pattern of abstemiousness, and even asks us to believe that she was as virtuous as most highly placed women of her day.

We are perfectly confident ourselves that Cleopatra's eyes were green. Yeux verts, yeux pervers, says the knowing Frenchman. Maligned, blackened hideously, the Queen of Queens may have been by Lucan, Ovid, Horace, and the rest, but her exceptional combination of loving and poisoning, mothering and mistressing, intriguing and skylarking, amassing and squandering, slaving and ruling compels her to have had green eyes. Moreover, at the celebrated banquet before Actium, when she explained to Anthony that the wreath she had thrown into the wine which she forbade him to drink was poisoned, she proved her assertion (says Plutarch) by calling for a captive and bidding him drink. The result on the unfortunate prisoner was instantaneous and dire, but not more dire than Mr. Weigall's deliberate omission of the proof positive. For these reasons and one other, equally good—namely, that we have met Cleopatras in real life, we affirm that they all have green eyes and not dark nor keen grey.

There is a Portuguese music-hall song which has as a refrain:—

Go and find me another girl,
This one will not do.

But is there nothing but censure for our daring author? On the contrary: people who have never read and never will read history "because it is so dry," and people who never read novels because they are so silly, may well read "The Life and Times of Cleopatra," because it is neither the one nor the other.

The plan of Ptolemaic Alexandria and the classical portraits much enhance the attractiveness of the volume.

PRESS ON THE NEAR EAST.

Jubaland and the Dodecanese.

The New Statesman of March 1 writes as follows upon the Dodecanese:—

> There is clearly a good deal of Italian pressure on the Government to make Italy a present of Jubaland straight away, without any reference to the connection, established long before the MacDonald Ministry came into office, between this question and that of the Dodecanese. That is very well, and there is, of course, every disposition to be friendly with Italy. But what kind of a proposition is it that these islands are to be detached from the Motherland, and their people handed over, like so much cattle, to Italy? It is not disputed that the population are Greek by origin, language, and culture, and that they passionately desire union with Greece. Roughly speaking, they contain about 100,000 Greeks. The Turkish element counts for about 4,000, and there may be 4,000 Italians and other nationals. Could there be a more overwhelming claim? And would it not be particularly odious for a democratic British Government to flout the wishes of these people for no other reason than that Signor Mussolini wants to make compulsory Italians of them? Is not this to repeat, on a small scale, the grand error of the Versailles Treaty?

The Manchester Guardian, in an article entitled "A Case for Generosity," refers to Article 13 of the London Treaty of 1915, which gave to Italy the right to territorial compensation in Africa if her Allies acquired German colonies as a result of the War, and proceeds:—

> In justice to Italy, it should be remembered that she was disappointed of certain other promises made in the London Treaty, and, therefore, attached all the more importance to Article 13. Nor were her expectations under that article wholly fulfilled. France refused to hear of ceding Jibuti, in French Somaliland (which she had not promised, but which Italy sorely coveted), and Italy had to rest content with a "rectification" of the Tunis-Tripoli frontier. The independence of Egypt has imperilled the cessions to Italian Cyrenaica which Italy counted on. The Jubaland claim is still unsettled. True, Italy's minimum demand is very substantial and somewhat inconvenient, as the proposed frontier, if made into a fiscal barrier, would interfere with traditional caravan-routes and watering habits of the natives. Cannot some kind of a free zone be created to get round this difficulty? Even at some sacrifice, Italy should, if possible, be made to feel that she has been fairly and even generously treated: and we cannot see that the sacrifice would really be heavy for this country. The port of Kismayu, already unconditionally offered to Italy, would seem to be the real plum. As to the linking-up of the question with a "general settlement," by which is, of course, meant a settlement of the complicated Dodecanese problem, what adequate reason is there for entering into a protracted and of necessity somewhat embittered controversy with Italy over a matter in which we have no direct interest, and which Signor Mussolini is more likely to settle (as he so surprisingly settled the question of Fiume) if left to himself?

The Mediterranean.

In discussing "The Mediterranean Fleet" the Manchester Guardian of March 1 seeks to interpret Italy's attitude. It says, after stating that the Mediterranean, in the intimate sense, is far more Italy's than Britain's:—

We must not then wonder if Italy is specially sensitive to the fact that we control its main exits and entrances at Gibraltar and Port Said, and are further ensconced in the island of Malta, so conveniently placed midway between the two, and standing sentinel between her own territory and her chief colony of Tripoli. The Italians sometimes feel as if they lived in a house and garden opening only on to a narrow lane. At each end is a gate, and to each gate a key, and these keys are in the pocket of a complete outsider, who amuses himself by promenading up and down the lane, and might (being an Englishman, and therefore, according to a humorous Italian saying, necessarily mad) take it into his head one fine day to lock the inoffensive inhabitants in.

We shall do well to think ourselves into Italy's frame of mind. The Italians should, in turn, think themselves into ours. Not by any peculiar rapacity (earlier colonising Powers showed themselves quite equally endowed in that respect), but by a mixture of obstinacy and pure luck, we became possessed, when the world was in a very fluid state, of a large Eastern and Oceanic Empire. Once acquired, it became part of our very life. A large section of our population lives by the proceeds of trade with it. Roughly, a third of our exports go to it and to neighbouring countries. Safe and swift communication with it, which must be through the Mediterranean, is as necessary for our life as safe and swift communication between London and Glasgow. The Mediterranean is our jugular vein. It is not to annoy the Italians or anyone else that we police the Mediterranean waters; it is to be certain of our daily bread. Could we be assured of absolutely safe conditions in the Mediterranean we would shed with alacrity the precautions which cause others annoyance. And then, after all, so long as we have a navy it must be kept somewhere. Since the war it has no longer been needed in the Channel or the North Sea, and the Mediterranean is a natural centre for part of it That is all, and no one need be alarmed at it.

The Government of Malta, availing itself of a recent decision of the American Courts, has announced that families can accompany emigrants returning to the United States within six months of their departure thence. This means that Maltese in the United States may come to Malta in order to take back their wives and children.

APPOINTMENTS, PROMOTIONS, Etc.

Major A. T. Miles, D.S.O., M.C., has been appointed British Consul for Southern Abyssinia.

The following Consular appointments are notified in the London Gazette:—Mr. Harold Eustace Satow, Consul-General for the Grand Lebanon and the Autonomous Territory of the Alawites; Mr. Robert William Urquhart, Vice-Consul at Cairo; Mr. Thomas Cecil Rapp, Vice-Consul at Suez.

Detective-Inspector J. Broadhurst, of the C.I.D., Scotland Yard, has just been appointed Assistant General Inspector of Police and Prisons for Palestine in charge of the C.I.D. He will sail to-morrow. Inspector Broadhurst, who joined the Police Force in 1900, commanded at the beginning of the War "B" Battery, 179th Brigade, R.F.A., and went to Cairo. He was in charge of the city of Jerusalem until the arrival of the Military Governor, and was mentioned in despatches. He is a Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society.

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London, W.C.2,
Tuesday Morning.

Budget Prospects.

It is now becoming quite clear that, despite anticipations to the contrary, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will have at his disposal a very substantial surplus. It is possible, therefore, to look forward a little more confidently to the coming Budget. A small surplus would have been regarded as an adequate excuse for confining the reduction of taxation to the breakfast table, but the business community will now rightly expect some further relief in the income-tax. Whether it will receive it or not is, however, a very moot question, for such a step would not be in accordance with Labour principles as they have been understood in the past. But the tenure of office makes a great difference in every respect, and it may well be that the present Administration will show itself fully alive to the harmful effects of the present incidence of this tax. After all, it will be perfectly possible to make some concession to what may be called the politics of the breakfast table besides taking something off the income-tax.

The Cotton Position.

A very marked change has come over the cotton position in the last few weeks. For some time there was a constant rise in prices, and it seemed as if we should see cotton in the near future at a very high level. But of late we have had falling prices, and American cotton to-day is considerably below the level that obtained a few months ago. In a sense the development is good, but it also has an unfavourable aspect. It would appear that two reasons are responsible for the present position. In the first place, more cotton is available than had been anticipated, and, in the second, there has been a very definite curtailment in the demand for cotton goods on account of the high prices. Of the demand for cotton goods abroad there is no question, and it is probable that the fall in cotton may result in a hardening inquiry, but that again, in its turn, will lead to higher prices for the raw commodity and a renewed restriction of demand. The position is extremely difficult, and there can be no real solution until ample supplies of cheap cotton are available.

The Outlook in Palestine.

We publish this week the first of a series of three articles on the finances and trade of Palestine, which will show in broad outline the present position in that country and will give briefly the particulars essential for the formation of an accurate judgment as to the outlook. For a variety of reasons there is now a far wider public interested in Palestine than ever before, and a knowledge of the progress that has been and is taking place there can only stimulate and add to that interest. Financially, as will be seen from the first article, the country is in a far from unfavourable position, though there is a paramount need for new capital on a considerable scale for the development of the country. If there is to be an appreciable advance, in fact, capital must be forthcoming: but there should be little difficulty in this respect provided a really good case can be made out for any proposed undertakings, for capital can now be attracted abroad only if there is a certainty of a reasonable return.

The Haifa-Baghdad Motor Service.

In spite of the winter rains, which are liable to keep tracts of the Syrian desert under water for an appreciable time, the mail service between Haifa and Baghdad has so far run without a missed connection. On a recent occasion a convoy left Baghdad on Thursday at 2 p.m., arrived at Damascus on Friday at 11 a.m., left on the return journey on Saturday at 5 p.m., and was in Baghdad by 5 p.m. Sunday.

The Exchanges.

The exchanges, or, rather, those of the Continent, have begun to represent anything but a satisfactory picture, and a certain amount of disquiet has not unnaturally been caused by the depreciation of French and Belgian francs. The cause of the decline is, of course, to be found in the policy that has been pursued since the War by our Allies. It would be premature to assume that we have seen the worst; indeed, in my opinion, both exchanges will probably depreciate still further. The only way to end the fall and to bring about some degree of stabilisation lies in the adoption of a stern and unflinching policy of economy by France. It is interesting to note that while French and Belgian francs have been depreciating the Italian exchange has been very steady. The Near Eastern exchanges, too, present a rather different picture. Some of them have of late shown a distinct tendency towards appreciation, and while others have made a variable showing, there has been nothing to suggest any further serious adverse movements. Indeed, if matters continue to progress favourably, there would seem to be no reason why the present year should not see a general appreciation. Good harvests over the Balkans, allowing an ample surplus for export, would make all the difference. If I had to single out one of the exchanges that I confidently expect to improve during this year, it would be Roumania, the potential strength of whose position I have often stressed in these columns. Circumstances hitherto have been adverse in the case of this country, but all reports now agree on the extent of the progress being made in the development of the oil industry and in other directions, and if it is maintained, the Roumanian exchange will not long remain at its present figure.

THE FINANCES AND TRADE OF PALESTINE.

I.—Capital Expenditure.

There is a growing number of people keenly interested in the condition of Palestine who would probably welcome a detailed survey of some of the principal economic facts on which it is possible to base a sound opinion as to the outlook for that country. The following series of three articles has therefore been prepared embodying the more important facts and figures. The present article deals with the expenditure which has been incurred during and since the war for the development of the country. The second will deal with the annual revenue and current expenditure of the Government since the establishment of the Civil Administration. The third will deal with certain questions relating to the foreign trade of Palestine. In order to free these statements from technicalities and to present them in the simplest form, round figures will be used and minor points will be omitted.

Expenditure During the War.

In the course of the campaign the British Army found it necessary to construct a broad gauge railway from Kantara to Haifa, to broaden the gauge of the existing railway from Lydda to Jerusalem, and to supply a quantity of engines and rolling-stock. It also carried out extensive works for the improvement of existing roads and the construction of new ones, for the development of the telegraph and telephone systems, for the provision of a water supply for the city of Jerusalem, and for other purposes. Some of these works were of a temporary character, but the greater part of them exist. On the withdrawal of the military administration so much of them as is situated in Palestine territory was taken over by the Government of Palestine for the use and benefit of the people of the country.

It was not to be expected that the British Government would make a free gift of railways, telegraphs, telephones, waterworks, and roads, which had been constructed at considerable expense, and which would either bring in revenue directly to the Palestine Government or indirectly add to the wealth of the country. On the other hand, the British Government recognised that Palestine is not at present in a position to provide the funds to pay for these works, or even to pay interest on their cost. The course that has been adopted is therefore as follows. A careful valuation has been made of the works in question. This valuation is not based in any degree upon the original cost. The works having been carried out under war conditions, the cost was very excessive compared with normal standards. The assessment has regard only to the present value of these works to the people of Palestine. The final sum has not yet been agreed, as the Government of Palestine has presented, on behalf of the Palestine taxpayer, a number of points for consideration. But it is possible that it may be found to be in the neighbourhood of £E2,000,000. When the position of the Palestine Budget has so far improved as to enable it to bear the charge, interest will be payable upon the sum, whatever it may finally be determined to be. Provision should also be made for the gradual repayment of the debt. Meanwhile, the people of Palestine have the full use, without charge, of these railways, roads, telephones, telegraphs, waterworks, and other assets.

Expenditure by the Civil Government.

Since July, 1920, the Civil Government has continued these works of improvement. A further sum of £E1,082,000 has been spent upon the railways. This includes £E408,000 for new rolling stock, an expenditure which has allowed the rolling-stock previously hired from the Egyptian State Railways to be returned, and an annual charge for the hire of £E70,000 to be saved. The sum so saved is equivalent to the yield to the Palestine Government of 17 per cent. on the £E408,000 borrowed for rolling-stock.

The main line has also been properly ballasted, and the interruptions to traffic which previously took place are now avoided. The line from Lydda to Jaffa has been converted to broad gauge. An excellent modern junction station has been constructed at Lydda. Materials and machinery have been purchased for the construction of up-to-date railway workshops at Haifa, which will enable a considerable economy to be effected in annual maintenance.

A sum of £E120,000 has been spent by the Civil Administration from borrowed money upon the development of telephones and telegraphs. The number of telephone subscribers has consequently increased from 80 in July, 1920, to 1,130 in January, 1924.

The capital expenditure on other services from loan funds up to March 31, 1923, amounted to £E218,000, namely:—Government buildings, £E35,000; roads and bridges, £E98,000; harbours and wharves, £E1,000; surveys, £E71,000; land settlement courts, £E9,000; afforestation, £E1,000; total, £E218,000.

In addition to capital expenditure which has been paid for out of money borrowed in anticipation of the Government loan, the Government has also spent on similar purposes certain moneys which were in its hands that had been collected by the Ottoman Public Debt Administration in Palestine. These moneys did not have to be transferred to the debt, owing to the delay in the conclusion of the Treaty of Peace with Turkey. From this source the following expenditure has been met:—Government buildings, £124,000; roads and bridges, £E300,000; telegraphs and telephones, £E23,000; other works of development (harbours, wharves, etc.), £E29,000; total, £E476,000.

The Jaffa-Jerusalem Railway.

It was considered essential, for the sake of efficiency and economy, that all the railways in Palestine should be under a single management—that of the State. The Peace Treaty with Turkey gave the Government the right to purchase the railway between Jaffa and Jerusalem, which belonged to the French company which had constructed it. The Treaty provided that the price, in default of agreement, was to be fixed by arbitration. The Government decided to exercise the right of purchase; agreement could not be reached as to the price. Arbitration took place, the arbitrators, as provided by the Treaty, being one appointed by each party and a president chosen by the arbitrators with the consent of their respective Governments. The amount awarded—namely, £E551,000—and interest and arbitration charges will approximate to a total of £E580,000. Of this £E299,000 has already been paid from loan funds, and £E98,000 from revenue since March 31 last, leaving a balance of £E183,000 to be paid within the next two years.

Loans to Cultivators.

The Government of Palestine has borrowed from the Anglo-Egyptian Bank a total sum of £E562,000 up to December 31 last for the purpose of loans to agriculturists to enable them to restore their industry after the war. Of this amount nearly one-half has now been repaid; £E363,000 was outstanding at March 31 last, and £E290,000 at December 31 last. The loans are secured on the land and other property of the cultivators.

The Government of Palestine also possesses stores to the value of £E244,000 as at March 31, 1923. These stores are in the hands of the Railway, Public Works, Post and Telegraph Departments. It had also to its credit at that date cash, imprests, and advances amounting to £E162,000.

Total Assets of the Government.

Under these various heads, therefore, the Government, as representing the people of Palestine, has come into possession since the war of the following assets (the values being taken as at March 31, 1923):—Railways, roads, etc., transferred from the British Army—possible final valuation, £E2,000,000; railway stock and improvements, roads, telephone plant, buildings, etc., provided by the Civil Administration, £E1,896,000; Jaffa-Jerusalem Railway, £E580,000; loans repayable by cultivators, £E363,000; value of stores, £E244,000; cash, imprests, and advances, £E162,000; total, £E5,245,000.

Debts of the Government.

Against these assets the Government has borrowed from the Crown Agents to meet the capital expenditure of the Civil Government a sum of £E1,349,000. It also took over from the British War Office stores to the value of £E290,000. This sum is not included in the capital valuation mentioned above, and it has to be repaid in five annual instalments; £E363,000 was owing to the Anglo-Egyptian Bank in respect to the loans to cultivators mentioned above. Other sums held on deposit or borrowed for particular purposes amount to £247,000.

The total debts of the Palestine Government, apart from future liabilities under the Peace Treaty in respect of the Turkish pre-war debt, are therefore as follows (as at March 31 last):—To the British Government for assets transferred—possible final valuation, £E2,000,000; to the Crown Agents, £E1,349,000; to the War Office for stores, £E290,000; to the Anglo-Egyptian Bank (agricultural loans), £E363,000; Jaffa-Jerusalem Railway Co., £E281,000; sundry deposits, £E247,000; total, £E4,530,000.

It consequently appears that the people of Palestine have come into the possession since the war of assets worth in round figures £E5,245,000. Against this amount they are liable to pay sums amounting to £E4,530,000. But of this debt nearly one-half is at present lent free of interest, with respect to which no charges for repayment are as yet being required. The difference of £E715,000 is made up of the actual surplus of revenue over expenditure at March 31 last—namely, £E239,000—and the sum of £E476,000 provided from O.P.D. revenue.

Future Capital Expenditure.

The country is in urgent need of further development. Expenditure is particularly required for the benefit of agriculture. Capital must be provided by the Government to assist in the establishment of an agricultural credit bank, as private enterprise is not willing to undertake that task. A stud farm for the improvement of breeding stock, the planting of forests, the drainage of swamps on State lands—these, and many similar activities would greatly increase the prosperity of the country and of its inhabitants. More main roads also are needed in several districts, and certain schools and other Government buildings are required. It is necessary also to repay the moneys temporarily borrowed from the Crown Agents in London. For all these purposes it is intended to issue a Government loan for £E2,500,000, and the sooner a propitious time arrives for its issue the sooner the Agricultural Bank can be established, and the other objects that are in view can be attained. The construction of a modern harbour, properly equipped, is also urgently necessary for the sake of the development of commerce and of industry. The plans for this work are now far advanced; the scheme may possibly be financed by a separate loan.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS.

The following extracts are taken from the current issue of the monthly circular of the Imperial Ottoman Bank:—

Mesopotamia.

Baghdad.—The market in general has not been characterised by any liveliness in December, such as is usually the case each year this time.

Piece Goods.—There was a great demand from Southern Persia for piece goods early in the month. This coincided with the receipt by local firms of instructions from their Manchester houses to refrain from parting with their stocks on account of the steady increase in prices of cotton. A number of sales ex stocks were, however, effected in view of the tempting prices offered by buyers, and a certain portion of the consignment arriving by the s.s. Jepore was also disposed of by forward delivery. Shortly after the second half of the month the market showed a downward tendency in sympathy with the decline of prices in Manchester and Persia. Prices here were nominal, and no important transactions were undertaken.

Raw and Tanned Skins.—Following the rise in the London market, prices here have advanced 20 per cent. during the month of December. The demand for skins from the European continent, and particularly from England, has been great, but the stock here is nearly exhausted on account of the large quantities consumed locally by packers of dates. A fairly large quantity has also been utilised in Mosul for rafts, which are the sole means of transport of cereals by river from Mosul to Baghdad.

Cotton Crop.—The cotton crop delivered at the Baghdad ginnery in the current year is equivalent to 1,000 bales of 400 lbs. of raw cotton, as compared with 300 bales in 1922 and 60 bales in 1921. A small quantity still remains to be delivered. The relatively high price of Rs. 500 per ton now being paid for seed cotton is likely to effect a considerable increase in the area under cotton next year. Reliable sources forecast that the 1924 output will be some 3,500 bales. The average yield of sixteen varieties of cotton grown experimentally on the Government farm this year is 1,537 lbs. of seed cotton per acre, as compared with 2,110 lbs. last year.

A Projected Concession for Irrigation in Irak.—The Government of Irak has decided in principle to grant a concession for the construction of an irrigation system, which will comprise a barrage at the Felluja (Euphrates) reservoir at the Habbaniyeh, and a canal along the left bank of the Euphrates, to a British group which will form a consortium for the purpose of exploiting it. By the terms of the concession, the consortium will undertake to construct, within five years from a date to be fixed, the Felluja barrage and Habbaniyeh escape, together with the Euphrates canal and certain principal regulators and other subsidiary work. In order to recoup itself for the expenditure, the consortium will have the cultivation rights of 1,000,000 acres of lands now lying waste, and will be entitled to use annually water sufficient to irrigate 400,000 acres of winter crop and 200,000 acres of cotton crop in summer. The balance of the water rendered available by the new works will be at the disposal of the Government of Irak.

The consortium will enjoy these rights for sixty years, after which period all the principal works and the 400,000 acres will revert to the Government. The Government tax on natural produce will be at first only 5 per cent. within the consortium's area. After a period to be fixed later, the tax will be raised to 10 per cent., and later to 15 per cent.

YUGOSLAVIA TO-DAY.

The Agricultural Position.

Whatever British merchants may think at the present time with regard to the Balkan countries—and the attitude of many of them certainly suggests the belief that that region holds out little prospects for them—the fact remains that it is to the Balkans that they will have to look sooner or later for no inconsiderable part of the increased trade that Great Britain must obtain if she is to support anything like her present population. Their present viewpoint, though, as a matter of fact, it is not a thing of to-day, but has always tempered British relations with the Near East, is due as much to ignorance of conditions in the countries concerned as to anything else. There may have been an attempt to enter the markets and an unfortunate experience at the start, and this has tended to colour the outlook. It would be foolish to attempt to deny the present difficulties in regard to trade with the Balkans arising from the adverse exchanges, but this obstacle will not obtain permanently, and already a marked tendency to improvement in some of the exchanges is to be noticed. Now, if ever, is the time to establish enduring relations with these markets; and the first and essential stage in the process is the possession of accurate information concerning them. One of these countries—Yugoslavia—is the subject of an admirable review*, which has just been issued, describing the economic and financial situation in that country at the beginning of the present year. The author, M. Milorad Nedelkovitch, enters in considerable detail into the subject, and what he has to say about the country's resources is of such interest that no apology is needed for quoting from it in extenso. Dealing with the agricultural position he says:—

Of a total population of 12,617,360 inhabitants (48 inhabitants to the square kilometre) 85 per cent. are engaged principally in agriculture, without mentioning those who are indirectly so employed. Thus it will be seen that agriculture is by far the most important industry in Yugoslavia. The whole area of the kingdom is 248,805 square kilometres. Of that area at least 90 per cent. is fertile (33 per cent. under seed, 22 per cent. pasturage, 2.2 per cent. vineyards and orchards, 41.8 per cent. forests, 1 per cent. fertile allotments), which is equal to between 8 and 9 hectares of fertile soil to each family of five. The soil is extraordinarily fertile in most districts.

The climate is very different according to the different parts of the country, as, for example, in the southern districts (especially in Dalmatia), where the temperature very seldom reaches freezing point, olives, oranges, almonds, lemons, tangerines, figs, and even, in South Serbia, rice, cotton, and opium are cultivated. In other districts plums, grapes, other fruits, tobacco—which does very well—wheat, maize, and other cereals can be grown with success all over the kingdom (Franguesch). This wide variety of products is of great economic value, as in the event of one particular harvest not being a success, other crops would more than balance the failure of one, since it is unlikely that there would be a bad harvest on all the products which Yugoslavia has to offer. Great hopes are based on irrigation schemes, etc., which will assist the peasants to combat the evil of drought and floods.

The Yugoslav peasant is passionately fond of his land, which he cultivates with great ardour. In many districts (Macedonia, Bosnia-Herzegovina) the methods are still very primitive; however, more up-to-date appliances are being brought to his notice, modern machinery and tools, better seeds and live stocks, artificial manures (in Yugoslavia there are three large factories capable of delivering 10,000 to 12,000 wagons of superphosphates, which is practically the only artificial manure essential for the soil in this country—potassium salts and chalk).

Taking into consideration the agrarian reform—about which more will be said later on—which has enabled the peasants in all districts to become entire owners of their lands—a fact which will no doubt urge them to greater efforts—the future agricultural production of the kingdom will certainly be increased.

It has been estimated in 1923 that, after deducting the amount necessary for the feeding of the population and livestock, sowing, etc., there will be the following amounts for export:—Wheat, 35,000 wagons; rye, 150 wagons; barley, 1,730 wagons; oats, 700 wagons; maize, 30,000 wagons; beans, 2,000 wagons, etc. One is, I think, justified in supposing that, with the increase of agricultural production, the available quantities for export will also be augmented. There are certain branches of agricultural production which are otherwise capable of expansion. Take, for example, sugar beet. . . . Much tobacco is grown which is famed for its aroma and freedom from nicotine. The output (100,000 quintals per annum) is increasing. In 1923 it was estimated that 4 million kilograms to the value of 200 million dinars were exported.

Amongst the plants used commercially mention must be made of the poppy, hop, flax, hemp, cotton, chicory, rapeseed, and others, which, in the same way as sugar-beet, are becoming more cultivated.

Not only can rural production be still more increased, but also the productive areas (by better drainage and canal systems and by reconstruction of earthen dams to check floods). A great deal of land had been rendered productive before the war by these means in Serbia, Dalmatia, Croatia, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Slovenia, and Voivodina. After the war the Irrigation Department of the Ministry of Agriculture drew up a programme with the object of rendering certain areas more fertile. If this programme is carried out, the production of cereals will be increased by 61,500 wagons per annum. It is estimated that the cost of these improvements would be 1,500 million dinars (15 to 18 million dollars).

Fruit tree culture is very advanced in Yugoslavia. The chief fruit is the plum; 61 million plum-trees in the country yield about 8 million quintals of fruit (13.5 kilograms per tree). In 1923 the total value of fruit exported was more than 250 million dinars.

Livestock in the kingdom was as follows in 1923:—Oxen, 4,058,400; buffaloes, 31,900; horses, 1,043,500; mules, 15,000; donkeys, 86,000; pigs, 2,577,700; sheep, 8,461,500; goats, 1,801,400; fowls, 13,810,200. The above figures show that this country is rich in livestock. It is estimated that during 1923 the export of dead and live stock was to the amount of 2,180 million dinars, a figure which is more than that of the cereal export.

The silkworm industry produces 500,000-600,000 kg. of cocoons per annum. There are 533,409 beehives in the kingdom.

LONDON PRODUCE REPORT.

Coffee Still Rising.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)
London, Tuesday Morning.

Sugar.—Home refined has continued in fair demand. Tate's cubes are unchanged at 67s. 9d., London granulated has been done at 64s. 1½d., while Lyle's granulated has come to business at 64s. 4½d. Foreign descriptions have been variable. White Java is unaltered at 61s. 3d., while Czech granulated has shed 9d. at 62s. Futures have been steady. Quotations are:—May, 32s. 3d.; August, 30s. 3d.; November, 24s. 3d.; December, 24s. 9d.

Coffee.—There has again been a sharp upward movement in most varieties of coffee. Costa Rica at 176s. is 6s. up on the week, Nairobi has risen 16s. to 140s., while Santos is 2s. up at 92s. Exceptionally, East Indian has declined to 136s., a drop of 28s.

Oilseeds.—Linseed has been weak, Indian at 20s. 9d. being 1s. 6d. lower, while La Plata is 1s. down at 18s. Rapeseed has been weak. Toria at 18s. 4½d. is 1s. 1½d. down, while real bold Ferozepore is 9d. lower at 17s. 3d. Cottonseed has been easy. Indian is unchanged at 10s. 7½d., Egyptian black is 3d. down at 13s., while Sakellaridis has shed 1s. 3d. at 12s.

Seed Oils.—Linseed has been weak, and at 41s. is 3s. down. Rape oil has been very dull, crude at 42s. being 6s. lower, while technical refined is unchanged at 51s. Cotton oil has been quiet. Refined common edible is 1s. down at 49s., Bombay crude has shed 1s. at 42s., Egyptian crude is 1s. lower at 43s., technical is unchanged at 46s., deodorised is 1s. down at 51s., while Egyptian refined is unaltered at 49s.

Oil Cakes.—The market has been dull. Linseed cake is 15s. lower at 265s., coconut cake is unchanged at 205s., while cottonseed cake has fallen 30s. to 160s.

Dried Fruit.—Generally business has been good in this commodity. Currants have been a specially firm spot, the demand being very firm. Sultanas have also been in strong request, though as a result of adequate supplies the market has shown no signs of hardening. Figs have moved off very freely during the week; indeed, the demand for this commodity has been an outstanding feature. Steady business has been done in plums, Bosnians again coming in for a good inquiry. There is nothing fresh to report with regard to dates.

Oranges. The market in this commodity has been very active. Consumption is on the up grade, and it is at least feasible that the increasing demand will bring about a rise in values. It is noteworthy that Jaffas have again been the medium of good business.

CROP CONDITIONS IN IRAK.

The agricultural bulletin of Irak for the period December 16 to January 15 gives the following particulars:—

The seasonal rains continued to hold off until the third week of December, with the result that winter sowing of cereals is greatly delayed. The winter temperatures, both maximum and minimum, are unusually high. The supply of water for irrigation is satisfactory in most canals. The flow in the Hillah Canal continues to be much below normal owing to repairs necessitated to the Hindiyeh Barrage. Desert vegetation is not sufficiently advanced to attract stock from irrigated areas. Condition of stock in general is as good as can be expected at this season.

The cotton crop delivered at the Baghdad Ginnery for the 1923 season is equivalent to 1,100 bales of 400 lb. of raw cotton. Numerous landowners are already ploughing the land preparatory for the cotton sowings in the spring. A memoir on the varietal test with cotton in 1922 at Rustam has been submitted for publication. Cotton exhibits for the British Empire Exhibition have been despatched. The cultivation of undesirable varieties of cotton is being prohibited in defined areas, and proposals are under consideration for restricting rice cultivation in the Dialah Liwa in the interests of cotton cultivation.

A demonstration of flax scutching is given weekly at the Cotton Ginnery, Baghdad. Many cultivators are undertaking the cultivation of relatively small areas of flax in the current season in anticipation of a commercial house coming forward to handle and purchase the crop.

The July to December exports of wheat for Irak were 57,109 and of barley 73,396 tons; total, 130,505 tons, as compared with 94,436 tons for the same period in 1922. The total export of the 1923 crop of dates to the end of December was 99,716 tons, valued at Rs. 123,95,522, as compared with 90,316 tons valued at Rs. 112,19,629 for the same period in 1922. The number of Arab ponies exported by sea to the end of November was 1,000.

The production of the Dacia Romano Petroleum Syndicate in February was 286 tons.

The Eastern Telegraph Company announces a final dividend of 2½ per cent., free of tax, on the ordinary stock, payable April 15, making 10 per cent., free of tax.

H.M. Consul at Beyrout states that, according to reports in the local Press, it is proposed to increase the present rate of Customs duty on imports into Syria and Great Lebanon from 11 per cent. ad valorem to 15 per cent. ad valorem.

The directors of Lloyds Bank announce that the Rt. Hon. Sir George Lloyd, G.C.S.I., G.C.I.E., has been re-elected to a seat on the board of the bank. Sir George was a director from 1911 to 1918, and resigned in the latter year on appointment as Governor of Bombay.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Wide Fluctuations in Futures.

The Alexandria Commercial Company, in their report for the week ended February 29, state :—

Since our last report the futures market has registered wide fluctuations. At the close the tone was dull. The weakness of our market during the past week must be attributed to the continued drop in New York and Liverpool and to the smallness of the demand from spinners. Speculators endeavoured to take advantage of these conditions to create a panic, but their efforts have not met with the success they hoped to achieve. The greater part of the stock remaining in Egypt is either hedged with futures or belongs to people of strong financial means, and the risk of forced liquidations is remote. Latest news from the textile centres is not very good; it appears that production in America has recently considerably exceeded consumption, and, to avoid accumulation of goods, mills are steadily curtailing their work. In England short time in the American section is now established. Elsewhere in Europe conditions in the textile trades are generally rather brighter, but the sharp depreciation of the French and Belgian francs and the involved political situation in most of the Continental countries may at any time unfavourably affect their industrial conditions. The difference between Sakel and Ashmouni remains unchanged; we consider the price of the latter in comparison to American somewhat dear. At the third February tender 1,250 krs dockets were issued. The total quantity of cotton received from up-country since the beginning of the season is now about 5,840,000 kantars.

On December 7 we published our final estimate of 6,250,000 to 6,500,000 kantars arrivals during the season, against our preliminary estimate on October 19 of 6,100,000 to 6,300,000 kantars. We think our final estimate will prove to be very near the mark. The week's receipts amount to 83,221 krs., against exports 159,752 krs.; the stock stands at 1,689,654 krs.

Spot.—The continued lack of demand from abroad has again had its effect on the spot market, sales registered amounting to only 10,800B/s, of which we estimate 7,200 B/s. Sakel, 3,500 B/s Uppers and 100 B/s Brown and Pilion.

Sakellaridis.—The bulk of the demand has been for fully good fair and fully good fair to good, the price of spot as compared with contracts being slightly stiffer for these grades. Some business has also been concluded in good fair to fully good fair, the price in comparison to contracts being about the same as last week.

Uppers.—All grades have been dealt in, the greater proportion of the sales put through being in fully good fair and above, premiums remaining unchanged.

Brown and Pilion.—The business done in these varieties has been practically negligible.

Crop 1924.—Climatic conditions continue favourable. Sowing in the southern regions is nearing completion; in the north it has not yet started. Reports regarding acreage in the Delta under varieties other than Sakel are very conflicting; that there will be a much greater proportion than last year is beyond doubt. The water supply is quite abundant for present requirements.

LIVERPOOL COTTON REPORT.

Fair Inquiry for Egyptian.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended March 5 :—

Egyptian Spot.—In spite of the erratic movements which have again prevailed in the futures market, the inquiry for spot Egyptian has continued on a very fair scale, and sales (including Sudan) have averaged a thousand bales a day. Confidence amongst buyers was further shaken at the beginning of the week, but during the last few days a better tone has been noticeable, and in many quarters the belief is expressed that the decline in prices has now come to an end. This more optimistic feeling, coupled with the probability that the threatened "lock-out" in the Lancashire mills may be averted, can only have a beneficial effect on trade, and should go far to restoring that confidence which is such a vital factor to all concerned.

The range of the inquiry has shown but little difference from that of the preceding weeks. Sakel "75 to 125 on" has been the inquiry mostly met with, and increased interest has again been shown in the good to fine cotton. It was only to be expected that after such a severe decline as we have recently experienced a few weak sellers should have made their appearance, but offerings from these have been quickly snapped up, and the basis for fully good fair cotton remains as before—that is to say, about "100 on" for any quantity. Cotton at anything under "25 on" arouses practically no interest at present, but it seems almost certain that later in the season this cotton, of which a considerable quantity is held in Liverpool, will acquire a much-enhanced value as compared with that ruling to-day. Low and re-cleaned cottons have been pressed for sale without tangible result in the majority of cases.

Uppers have been in fair request again at from "pass price" March contracts to "100 on." A good deal of irregularity is still apparent in the market for this cotton, but there seems little doubt that in the main sellers are steadily hardening their basis. More inquiry from the Continent has been noticeable during this week, and a certain amount of business has actually been placed. A fair business has been done in Sudan cotton, chiefly in the white variety. Brown, Pillion, and White Egypts have been neglected. C.i.f. business remains very moderate owing to the continued strength of Alexandria as compared with Liverpool. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending the 1st inst. were returned as 11,126 bales. Estimated sales, 5,500 Egypts and 450 bales Sudan. Quotations of Upper are 40 points lower (fair 30); Sakellaridis is 60 points lower (fair 30). Brown cotton is reduced 60 points all round. F.G.F. Sakel to date 20.05d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Business on Quiet Side.

The Manchester cotton trade review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended March 8 states :—

A very quiet state of affairs has prevailed during the past week, several factors militating against any immediate revival of activity. Raw cotton was very weak at the commencement, and when this is the case buyers usually withhold offers for the time being. Further, merchants have not yet reconciled themselves to the very much firmer attitude now being displayed by spinners, and are disposed to see whether they will not be compelled by force of circumstances to relax a little.

The spinning dispute mentioned in previous reports still overhangs the trade. The employers' lock-out notices expire during the course of next week, and at the moment, quite contrary to what had been expected, it looks as if they might be allowed to take effect.

Yarn.—Inquiry has been on a fairly good scale. As already stated, something of a struggle between buyers and sellers is taking place. Spinners are holding to their quotations very strongly, but buyers are not yet convinced that the movement towards higher prices will be a success. There is nothing fresh to report with regard to Egyptian spinnings, which continue to be taken up fairly satisfactorily.

Cloth.—There is no improvement to record in this section. Inquiry has been good, but the prices mentioned in many cases are far too low. A moderate business has been done for China, but Indian demand is disappointing. Somewhat better advices have been received from Egypt and the Near East, although there has been no great amount of business put through from these quarters.

Raw Cotton.—This market was distinctly weak on Saturday and Monday last, but there was some recovery on succeeding days, American showing a decline on the week of 42 points, whilst Egyptian has risen 35. Nevertheless it cannot be said that there is any great belief that present quotations represent the stability which Manchester desires. Closing prices yesterday were as follows :—American Fully Middling, 17.21d. ; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 20.85d.

An international town-planning conference will be held at Amsterdam from July 2 to 9.

H.M. Commercial Secretary at Constantinople reports that the precautions against plague imposed on arrivals from Beyrout have been withdrawn.

The traffic receipts of the Egyptian Delta Light Railways for the ten days ended February 20 amounted to £E10,108, making the total from April 1 £E296,594.

The allotments in respect of the Karachi Port Trust loan have been issued. Subscribers for amounts of £5,000 and above have received 90 per cent. of the sums applied for.

The British Overseas Bank announces that funds for the payment of the coupon due April 1, 1924, on the bonds of the Roumanian Four per Cent. Consolidation Loan, 1922, were lodged with it on March 1 by the Roumanian Government.

H.M. Consul-General at Beyrout reports the promulgation by the French High Commissioner of a decree authorising the creation of general storehouses, and also the opening in connection therewith of public salerooms. In this decree details are given as to the amount of caution money to be deposited, methods of obtaining permits, responsibilities of the management, tariff and charges, rules and forms of receipts (certificates of deposit or receipts to order). A subsequent decree authorises the Port Company to open and work, as from December 28, 1923, a general storehouse and saleroom, of which one part will serve as a transit house. This part is to be entirely separate from the rest of the store. Goods may remain in this transit warehouse for a period of one year, which can be extended for a second year.

TENDERS INVITED.

Tenders are invited for the following contracts, and must be made by the dates mentioned.

(Particulars of tenders marked D.O.T. are to be obtained from the Department of Overseas Trade, 35, Old Queen Street, S.W.)

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Greek Crisis.

A strange turn has been given to the Greek constitutional crisis with the advent to power of a Republican Government. One of the first acts of the Prime Minister, M. Papanastasiou, has been to place himself in touch with some of the Royalist leaders and to offer them a choice between civil war and the acceptance of certain conditions. Although it is claimed that the idea of a compromise originated with the late Prime Minister, it is evident that the details must be attributed to M. Papanastasiou, who is not only sure of his own position, but has also been able to convince the Royalists that nothing can now prevent the establishment of a Republic, and that attempts to bring the King back can be made only at the cost of civil war. His alternative proposal is that the King should resign willingly, preserving his title and receiving four-fifths of his annual civil list; that the Republic should be proclaimed by the Assembly, subject to an immediate free plebiscite; that a general amnesty should follow, with the reinstatement in their posts of dismissed Royalist officers and civil servants; that a statesman acceptable to both sides should be elected President of the Republic; that a Senate should be created, two-fifths of its members belonging to the Royalist group; and that as soon as the new régime is established a general election should be held by a business Government within the present year.

The Royalists' Dilemma.

There can be no question that M. Papanastasiou's offer is a statesmanlike one, which reflects considerable credit upon him. At the same time it places the Royalists in a cruel dilemma. The Republican position has been reached by bluff or force; the country without doubt remains monarchist at heart, but it is sick to death of the murders and civil war associated with Venizelism, and here is a bold proposal that promises internal peace and self-respect for all parties, because the solution will have been reached by voluntary compromise. The Royalists have to ask themselves what they could achieve when a plebiscite gave them a majority. If the Republican hold on the army is complete, they can avail nothing; if it is only partial, the most that they can hope for is civil war. In these circumstances there should be no hesitation in accepting the Republican offer, even though they are convinced that Greece can never prosper under a Republic. Prosperity must bide its time; what is needed to-day is internal peace, a return to stabilised conditions. Not the least merit of this unexpected solution is that it has been evolved after M. Venizelos has confessed his inability to cope with the Greek crisis and has retired from the scene. With his failure—pathetic as it is in many ways, but a god-send to Greece—Venizelism (which dates from 1915 and has brought nothing but ill to the country) passes into the limbo of deservedly lost causes.

Greece and Great Britain.

Last week dynamite cartridges were exploded at the front door of the British Legation in Athens. The steps were damaged, the heavy door blown in, and a number of windows broken. Fortunately, the outrage occurred after midnight, and no injury was done to any of the personnel of the Legation. As will be readily understood, it has come as a relief to the Greek people to find that the British Government does not intend, on the strength of the outrage, to occupy Corfu or Crete, that the Greek Navy will not have to salute the British flag, nor the new Cabinet go on its hands and knees from Constitution Square to the British Legation by way of convincing the world of the might and power of Great Britain. What has actually happened, we understand, is that the British Government has shown a ready sympathy with Greece in being placed in a false position by such an outrage. The Greek Government has acted with punctilious correctness. In spite of the hour at which the explosion took place, the Prime Minister arrived shortly afterwards at the Legation to express his regret at what had happened. Arrests have been made, although it is not yet known whether the actual culprit has been discovered. In any case, the episode, as was to be expected in the case of a self-respecting nation, was regarded as closed as soon as it occurred.

Negotiations with Egypt.

The imagination of the vernacular Press in Egypt has been given full rein over the visit to London of

Digitized by Google

Dr. Hamid Mahmoud, a member of the Egyptian Legislative Assembly and a personal friend of, as well as medical adviser to, Zaghloul Pasha. It was assumed that, in coming to England so soon after his election to the Assembly, Dr. Hamid must be charged with an important mission, and nothing seemed more natural than that the time should have come for negotiations between Egypt and Great Britain on the questions specifically reserved for subsequent discussion. This theory ignored the fact that there is already an Egyptian Minister in London, who would be the proper person to conduct the preliminaries to such negotiations, and that Zaghloul Pasha, who has given ample evidence of a conciliatory attitude in all his relations with Great Britain, would hardly entrust the overtures to delicate negotiations to anyone less friendly disposed than himself towards burying the past and drawing up on a clean slate a new charter of Anglo-Egyptian relations. Dr. Hamid Mahmoud has resided in England for many years, but he belongs for the moment to the extreme section of Egyptian Nationalists. His devotion to Zaghloul Pasha took him back to Egypt and in due course he became elected a member of the Assembly. Egypt will now become his place of residence, and there seems no reason to attribute high political motives to a visit which has been undertaken primarily to enable Dr. Hamid to transfer his personal effects from England to his own country.

The Reserved Questions.

All the indications point to early negotiations regarding the reserved questions. These are four in number: The Suez Canal; the Army of Occupation; the protection of foreign interests and minorities: and the Sudan. It may be due to the brevity of the title of the last question that it has been seized upon as a popular cry, in spite of the fact that it is the one in regard to which Great Britain has the least chance of being able to meet Egyptian aspirations. If the other questions are found to weigh lightly upon Egypt, or indeed to cast no shadow at all, in the region of practical politics, on the completeness of Egyptian independence, it would be better to leave the discussion of these subjects in abeyance for a further period. When experience has shown both parties that there is nothing in the reservations—Egypt, that they entail no practical hardship; Great Britain, that they are superfluous, inasmuch as her earlier fears prove unfounded—a satisfactory settlement will be more easily reached than now, when each side is apt to place an inflated value on the reservations.

Yugoslavia.

Yugoslav politics show a tendency to run in cycles. After M. Pashitch has remained for a period in office, his political opponents acquire sufficient courage or strength to challenge his supremacy. A period of political change and uncertainty follows, until the Radical leader has had time to hold an election or to effect the necessary political combinations to defeat or silence his opponents, and once more the latter retire discomfited within their lines. A troubling of the political waters has now been effected by M. Raditch, who, after lengthy reflection in various places of exile, has decided to abandon for his party his foolish policy of abstention from the Skupshtina. Whether he will risk arrest by returning to Belgrade himself remains to be seen; but his Croatian followers have begun to take their seats in the Skupshtina, and the Radical Government is threatened with being placed in a minority. It is not the first time that M. Pashitch has extricated himself from a tight political corner, and the Balkan millenium which is to follow his final elimination from Yugoslav politics may yet be some way off.

The Indian Budget in the Assembly.

The opening stages of the manœuvres over the Indian Budget have been distinctly interesting. The new bloc first succeeded in refusing some indispensable grants, though with a significant shrinkage in its paper voting power; it then offered to discuss the remaining grants on normal lines; and then, as an early illustration of the meaning of that ambiguous phrase, reduced the railway Budget because the Government had declined to flout Parliament by ignoring the existence of a Royal Commission. We do not suppose that the Administration will allow itself to be seriously hampered by these decisions, which can be corrected under the existing Constitution, and the real significance of the proceedings lies rather in the evidence they furnish of the development of tension within the bloc. Like other temporary aggregations of the kind, it includes two wings and a centre, with fissiparous tendencies in each group, and the Pandit from Allahabad, who is trying to lead, is feeling the pull first of one wing and then the other, as well as the competition of individuals for his position. It is not good politics yet, but, regarded as politics-in-the-making, it strikes us as decidedly promising, and, at any rate, marks an advance over the position of a year ago.

Where Politicians are Agreed.

The truth is that, while Indian politicians have not yet escaped into the region of realities, they are moving slowly in that direction, and their actual desires and ideals are beginning to appear among the catchwords and labels which have hitherto dominated the field. By-and-by they will probably sort themselves out into groups on the new basis, and then there will be some approach towards the stability on which political progress must depend, but for the moment they must be classed with the embryons of Milton's chaos, and "to whom these most adhere, he rules a moment." That there is unanimity on one important point was, however, brought out clearly last week by the Under-Secretary of State's reply to Mr. Lansbury's question on the franchise. Mr. Richards has been unable to find that any of the embryons has as yet declared himself in favour of an increase in the number of voters, though all concur in claiming extended powers for the representatives. This fact is familiar to our readers, and we welcome the official recognition that, amidst so many diversities of opinion, Indian politicians have reached the conclusion that it is quite unnecessary to ascertain the views of the people of India.

Speculators and Investors.

The summary of the report on the Bombay Stock Exchange shows that the public criticisms which led to the appointment of a Committee of Inquiry were fully justified. The institution has, in fact, been managed in such a way as to favour the wild speculation so popular in Western India, its management has been quick to save imprudent gamblers from the consequences of their miscalculations, and the investor has usually had to pay, with the result that the market is threatened with utter demoralisation and final destruction. We wish it were possible to feel quite confident that changes in laws and rules, such as are now recommended, will suffice to ensure reform. They are certainly required, but what is really wanted is a change in the attitude of Bombay itself, and increased subjection to the public opinion of a much wider area. The seaports of Western India have been gambling dens as far back as their history can be traced, and the habit is one that dies hard. The task now before the commercial leaders of the region is to divert the old spirit of enterprise into new channels, and to employ their wealth in meeting public needs at a profit, instead of backing their own wits in a barren struggle with their neighbours.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Tuesday Morning.

The Luck of Twickenham.

It is scarcely possible to conceive any greater happiness befalling the modern Englishman than that which he enjoyed on Saturday afternoon, when he saw his country get their eighth consecutive win in International Rugger. A score of nineteen points to nothing might make it appear that Scotland were out of the running, but that was very far from being the case. The whole English side had to swelter considerably on this hot spring afternoon, and the Scots, on the whole, were unlucky not to score. Deny it as strenuously as their forwards and threes might, it did seem to Scotland that there was something in the old legend of "the luck of Twickenham."

London was well pleased with itself on Saturday night, and, too, some of those barbarians from the North who deigned to stop the night in the city of their country's downfall contrived by means not unknown to Mr. Scrymgeour to efface, at least temporarily, the pointless efforts of the heroic and unfortunate Scottish fifteen.

Governmental Complications.

There hardly seems justification for the fuss that has been made by opponents of the Government over incidents arising from the shortness of time at the Government's disposal. Its defeat in a matter of no importance has no significance, and, although it is a more serious factor that the Government has had to take responsibility for the Mines Bill—for it would seem that the Government is siding with the miners in their dispute with the masters, which must be settled before April 17—yet everybody knows where the Government's sympathies in this matter are.

However, there does not appear to be in the present House anyone capable of taking, or willing to take, advantage of the Government's difficulties and complications. Most people seem to be content that the present occupiers of office should continue to prolong their embarrassment at least until the Empire Exhibition is over. But Mr. Winston Churchill, should he be returned to-morrow for Westminster, will probably instil some sort of conviction into the jaded opponents of the Government.

Conjuror Twos.

Day by day the melancholy truth is forced home on the Government that they are not a set of Conjuror II.'s. When the Labour Party assumed office they thought that they would leave Mr. Lloyd George, with his promises of a mere ninepence for fourpence, far behind. But it cannot be done. Only the other day some disillusioned Minister had to confess to the House that his party really could not produce rabbits out of a hat—the conjurors are carrying too much weight. And the Aintree course is nothing to what the Government has to get round.

Hopes, however, are commonly disappointed on reaching office. But it is not often that one has so flagrantly to break a promise as is involved in the Premier's revised treatment of the question of the pensions of ex-ranker officers. Before he knew much about the problem, Mr. MacDonald asserted that all officers should receive equal treatment. But upon examination of the question he has had to go back completely on this. Frankly as he confessed his conversion to the new point of view, he narrowly escaped defeat in the House in the voting on the subject. One knows, of course, that vote-catching promises are not indulged in solely by Socialists, but it is seldom that they return on their unhappy maker with such discomforting effect as was manifested the other day.

At the Leicester Galleries.

Much journalistic pother was caused by the objection raised by Lord Birkenhead to the naming of Mr. C. W. R. Nevinson's paintings on "Peace" as "glittering prizes." The pictures objected to, which I have seen, are three in number, and are now called "Peace." The satire in them is obvious, and their appeal is so immediate as almost to be superficial. They show two demobilised soldiers singing in the street to gain a few coppers —"And still they have their hats off"; a typical scene on a battlefield, with dead and wounded and wire and holes, all faithfully and without exaggeration done—"A Memorial to our Heroic Speakers, from a Few Unknown Soldiers"; and a profiteer and his coarse wife in an opera-box—"Success." The sensation that they have caused was probably not undesigned, but they scarcely strike deep. They are, in truth, just as far from real art as good journalism is from real literature. It is a relief to turn from them to Mr. Nevinson's landscapes, which are very beautiful indeed.

These paintings are being exhibited at the Leicester Galleries, where there is also another notable exhibition: Mr. Vernon Hill's etchings. The quality of the imagination shown in these etchings is very rarely encountered in London art galleries. In their combination of formality with imaginative freedom they seem to me remarkable.

Rhetoric.

The Unions at Oxford and Cambridge appear to be much more important places they they were in pre-War days. Possibly it is merely that the Press has grown more ignorant and thinks that what is said by jejune undergraduates now may have some conceivable influence in shaping their opinions of the future. However that may be, we now quite often have to suffer inexpressibly dull leading articles on the subject of the flippant vote of the undergraduate. The other day the papers were full of the iniquity of the Cambridge Union's President in giving his casting vote in favour of a motion which expressed approval of rhetoric.

Rhetoric and the modern use are, of course, an intensely interesting subject, rather better understood at the older Universities than most things, and it was in all probability not only the fact that the ex-Premier, Mr. Baldwin, was in opposition to the motion that made the discerning President cast his vote in favour. For rhetoric is the breath of modern life, and he is dead for all public purposes who does not use it and enjoy its use. The far-flung splendour (which is rhetoric) that surrounds our Hobbs's, our Churchill's, and our Beattys is as essential to the modern man as is the rhetoric of Liszt to the musician. It is not, as Mr. Baldwin tried to demonstrate, rhetoric that has given us our Socialist catch phrases, our President Wilsons, our Mr. Lloyd Georges; it is the logical and inevitable outcome of the adoption of the democratic system. Rhetoric is certainly an imposture, but democracy is a sham. Rhetoric dazzles and englamours, but democracy stupefies.

The Spring.

It may well be that before this paragraph is in print the weather will have changed against us, but it must be written if only as a record of the gratitude of the country for the joyous days and nights that have thrilled and chilled us. The sunshine has been gorgeous, and you could see old men who but a week or so ago were complaining that the winter seemed unending frolicking up and down the Strand without their overcoats on. But what really made us all feel that the long winter was dead was the publication in the newspapers of a photograph of Hendren coaching some schoolboys how to hold a straight bat.

Digitized by Google

We had at once to go and see how dry our own blades were of oil, how many strings in our rackets had gone during the winter, and, in general, to decide that our flannels would have to do for one more season. The Englishman, for all his enthusiasm for football, adores his meagre sunshine, and I have heard during the past week more tolerant and intelligent conversation than was uttered during the whole of February. Other members of the British family may need a little more, but a drop of sunshine such as he has had in the past week and the Englishman at any rate feels that all's right with the world.

The Philharmonic Choir.

After last week casting doubts on London's musical culture, it is a pleasure for me to say that at any rate we have composers. The other night I went to hear the Philharmonic Choir at the Queen's Hall, partly because they are easily the best choir in the South of England, and from the point of view of musical enterprise the best in England, and partly because Holst's "Hymn of Jesus" was being performed. This work, I am convinced, is one of the greatest things in choral music ever written. In comparison with its magnificence, the cautious tunes of Parry's "Blest Pair of Sirens," the longueurs of Franck's "Psyche," and the manifest dullness of Beethoven's "Choral Fantasia" palled a little on one. It seems a pity, in view of the intense knowledge of music in the choir and in its conductor, Mr. Kennedy Scott, that a better balance and more voices with the freshness of youth could not be secured. Still, but for them one would never hear in this part of the world Holst's work sung, and so long as they keep before us such names as Delius (whose exquisite pianoforte concerto was played at this concert) and Holst, they deserve the gratitude of everyone with a spark of real musical feeling in him.

The Premier and Nonconformity.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald can talk to the Nonconformists every whit as well as Mr. Lloyd George used to, and his address to them at Brighton reads very well. He spoke on the vulgarity and on the false valuations of the age. These he appeared to attribute to the individualist system, which produced the seeking after riches and "honours" as the main end in life.

None of this is new, of course—Nietzsche hammered out the truth of it many years ago, and I daresay observers have noticed it ever since the world began. But what our modern prophets do not appear to realise very fully is the fact that these materialistic evils have become painfully apparent only since the wave of democracy swept over the land. The British people is, whatever the political theorists may say, an aristocratic people, and it is the attempt to make a democracy of us that produces this disgusting search after "honours" of which the Premier so rightly complains. But whether in his Socialist State things would in this respect be any better is extremely doubtful.

Governmental Accuracy.

To lighten the sorrows of these heavy times the Post Office, with ineffable seriousness, is telling us that we are in the habit of addressing our letters wrongly. In particular, that we should never put merely "Bath" or "Ipswich" on our envelopes; it will not guarantee safe delivery of our letters unless we conform to its reading that "Bath, Somerset," and "Ipswich, Suffolk," is the proper postal address. This is really rather rot. There is in England neither another Bath nor Ipswich than the one everybody knows. It is quite another matter if we are asked to write "Glasgow, Lanark," or "Edinburgh, whatever county it is in."

Naturally, because nothing so arouses parochial pride as small matters, Bath and Ipswich are indignant at the Post Office's tactless implication that there are other Baths and Ipswiches which have any significance in the world. It must have been an impertinent Cockney who has thus brought down fire on the Post Office's head.

Lost England.

One of the most fascinating geographical studies is that of coast erosion and of the reclaiming of land from the sea. The report from Lowestoft that a sea wall is going and that a million tons of beach are gone has therefore aroused wide interest. In the East Coast of England probably the sea is waging its most successful fight, for there are up and down this coast very numerous vanished villages. But there are, of course, many submerged forests all round the English coast. Yet people are sometimes wont to forget the pros in concentrating on the cons. Some parts of England are evidence of the victory of the land over the sea. On the East Coast itself one has but to remember that where Yarmouth now stands the sea once ebbed and flowed, for it went right up to the present Bure. On the Sussex coast, again, Winchelsea and Rye are proofs of the receding of the sea, for they were once ports. On balance one must suppose that the land is the loser against the sea, but people are beginning to doubt the existence of those vanished continents—Atlantis and the rest—and rather incline to think that all this talk of lost lands is merely a dodge of the scientists to explain the dispersion of species.

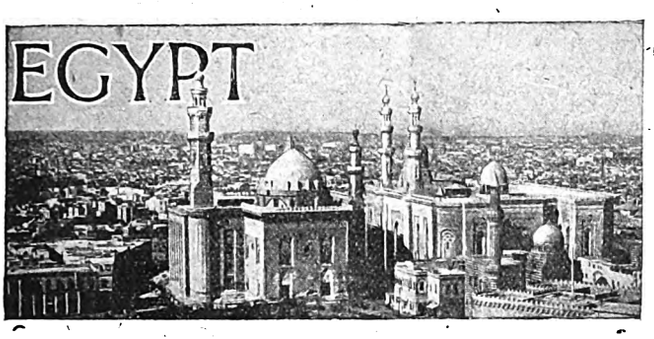
From Our Own Correspondents.



Cairo, March 9.

The Tomb.

The Tutankhamen obsession continues as strongly as ever, and during the past week two events have contrived to fan the flame higher still. First, the official reopening of the tomb on Thursday was made by the Egyptian Government into a day of national rejoicing, or something approaching it, while, secondly, the resumption in the Mixed Courts of the hearing of the application by the executors of the late Lord Carnarvon for the appointment of Mr. Carter as sequestrator again aroused much public interest. Both in Cairo and at Luxor many unfavourable comments were made on the manner in which the Government conducted its official reopening. In the first place, the necessity for an official ceremony while the lawful possession of the tomb is still in dispute before the Courts is not clear. The breaking into the tomb was understandable, since it had been stated that the sarcophagus was in danger, while once the tomb was reopened it was obviously in the country's interests to allow as many tourists as possible to see the interior. But the opening ceremony has brought into the dispute a political colour which the Egyptian Government had declared itself anxious to avoid. Certainly most of those present in the Valley of the Kings on Thursday, and every one of the thousands of fervent Zaghloulist supporters who thronged Upper Egyptian railway station platforms to cheer the special trains on their way to Luxor, felt that the important feature of the day's proceedings was that they marked the triumph of the independent Egyptian Government over a troublesome foreign excavator. It was all too suggestive of Governmental gloating to be pleasant. Yesterday's proceedings in the Mixed Courts gave the impression that both sides were sparring for time, in the hope that the negotiations still being carried on through the good offices of Professor James Breasted may yet result in the dispute being settled out of Court.

The Khalifate.

Whichever way the Tutankhamen controversy may be decided, it has now fallen from first place in importance, ousted by the Angora Government's action in banishing the Khalif. In this connection a remarkable change has come over Egyptian Moslem opinion. When the Turkish Government exiled the former Khalif and modified the status and powers of the office, Egyptian opinion applauded the decision. Mustapha Kemal was then, in Egyptian eyes, a super-man, who could do no wrong. To-day, on the other hand, it would be hard to find a single Egyptian who does not condemn the banishment of the Khalif Abdul Mejid. The Arabic newspapers are unsparing in their attacks on the latest action of Turkey's present rulers, which, it is declared, will lose the Turks the sympathy of the whole Moslem world. Egyptian sentiment towards Turkey has not changed so completely through religious considerations alone, though here there is entire unanimity regarding the illegality of the latest deposition; the change is connected with political affairs. During the Greco-Turkish war, and especially immediately after the Turkish victory, Egyptians—on what grounds it is hard to say—placed great hopes in the Turks as allies in realising Egyptian nationalist hopes. When it became apparent, at the Lausanne Conference, that the Angora Government cared not a jot for the political future of Egypt, there was a sad disillusionment here, and since that time feeling, which had previously been so strongly pro-Turkish, has flowed more and more in an opposite direction, until to-day, of all foreign States, Turkey is probably the most unpopular.

But, while Moslem opinion here is unanimous that the exiling of the Khalif Abdul Mejid is illegal, there is also full realisation of the fact that his deposition is none the less effective, since a refugee in a foreign country cannot be the "Commander of the Faithful." The chief point of discussion here is, who shall be the next Khalif, for, excluding a comparatively small and very advanced group, who might be termed Protestant Moslems, and who consider that there is no longer need nor room in Islam for a Khalif, the general opinion is that a successor should be found as soon as possible, and that he should be the most powerful of independent Moslem rulers. Who, say several of the local newspapers, has such valid claims in this direction as King Fuad, whose country is now the richest and most powerful Moslem State? Egypt was the seat of the Khalifate until it was wrested by the Turks from the last of the Abbassides, and now that the Turks have abandoned their heritage, justice demands that it should return to the Valley of the Nile. Other journals urge that it is useless for any one group of Moslems to attempt to choose a Khalif, for, just as Egypt refuses to recognise the proclamation of King Hussein, so, if Egypt herself takes the initiative, will other countries reject the appointment. The only solution, it is urged, is the holding of a congress representative of all Moslem countries, to make the selection. It is contended, and not without some reason, that the most suitable place for such a conference would be Cairo. Whether anything will be done towards putting the plan into execution remains to be seen.

The Opening of Parliament.

Egypt is a great country for openings; it seems that there is always something or other being inaugurated. But next Saturday's event is of more than usual interest, for on that day King Fuad will open Parliament and, in the presence of members of both houses, the speech from the Throne will be read, regarding the contents of which there are many conjectures. It is an open secret that the drafting of the speech has been a matter of no little difficulty, the exact wording of references to the Sudan, to relations with Great Britain, and to other delicate matters having required much discussion. It is expected that the Prime Minister will make a formal reply to the Royal speech and will reserve a full exposition of his policy to another occasion. A message of good will from the British Government will also be read.

Labour Troubles.

Though there has been no serious violence in connection with the strikes which have continued during the past week in various Alexandria factories and workshops, these incidents have shown how easily there might be quite serious trouble in Egyptian industrial circles, and have reinforced the opinion expressed last week that the Government should waste no time in thoroughly investigating labour conditions and in introducing legislation to protect the workers. So far the only apparent action on the part of the Government has been to carry out police raids in search of Communists, several of whom have been arrested and, it is said, are to be tried on charges whose exact nature it will be interesting to see, for even in Egypt it is not illegal to hold Communistic opinions.

New Steamship Services.

It is announced that Egypt is shortly to have a regular fortnightly steamship connection with America, through the Dollar line, which has just put seven boats on to a round-the-world service from San Francisco via the Panama Canal, Mediterranean ports, Port Said, and far eastern ports, back to the starting point. Mr. Dollar, the president of the line, was in Egypt for a couple of days last week and met a number of leading Egyptian business men at the American Legation, and it was then that he made the announcement of this new service.

The Tourist Season.

Egypt is now at its busiest so far as tourists are concerned: from now on the stream of departing guests will swell, while the flow of new arrivals will dwindle until, by the end of this month, it will have almost entirely ceased. The hotels announce fête after fête for the entertainment of their guests, while in private houses also a very great deal of entertaining is being done. In fact, an old resident remarked yesterday that he did not remember ever having known so many private dances in Cairo in any previous year.

YUGOSLAVIA.

Liubliana, March 5.

The Opposition Bloc.

Ever since the New Year the forthcoming début of a so-called Opposition Bloc has been publicly and persistently discussed. Nevertheless, week after week has gone by, and the Opposition Bloc remains an unborn child. Small wonder that all the talk about it is gradually being described as much ado about nothing.

And with a fair amount of justification, too. It is certainly a fact that the present Government does not command a majority in the Skupshtina, and that its hours would, therefore, be numbered the moment the combined Opposition parties were to put in appearance there. But this is precisely what is not happening, and so the Government was able to win over even the most ticklish matters and to get through the business of the State in time and fairly well according to programme. But now one is told that the Opposition Bloc is a fact resolved upon and the appearance of the Raditch deputies in the Skupshtina a dead certainty. Their arrival is discussed with such assurance that the very date of this important event is already mentioned. All the same, one is justified in preserving a sceptical attitude as regards the prospering of the Opposition Bloc on account of the great divergencies between the various parties which constitute it.

It is true that all Opposition parties fervently desire the overthrow of the Radical Government. But upon the question "What next?" their opinions diverge; the adherents of the Opposition parties are unable to furnish a plain and workable reply to it, and so they are distrustful of one another and incapable of swift and determined action. The political position is such that the Opposition could give promise of positive achievement only if at least thirty of the Serbian deputies could see their way to join it—deputies, moreover, who could be sure of winning a fiercely contested electoral fight. For MM. Koroshets, Spaho, and Raditch, being leaders of purely regional parties, cannot possibly by themselves collect a majority in the Skupshtina, but would have to rely upon the co-operation of at least thirty Serbian deputies, not only for arithmetical reasons, but even more on account of moral considerations, since a Government in Yugoslavia which excluded the Serbs would be simply an impossibility. With the enlistment of the Democrat leader, M. Davidovitch, for the Bloc, this (the greatest) difficulty was now supposed to have been solved, and the Press duly announced the fact that M. Davidovitch had indeed joined the Bloc. Yet it still failed to be effectively constituted, and for the following reasons:—

The Democrats wished, by means of the Opposition Bloc, to obtain the mandate for the formation of the new Government, when they hoped to secure good electoral prospects for their party by means of the administrative machine. As they come third as regards strength among the parties, their plan was to gain the help of the second party in strength—i.e., the Raditch Party—and then, supported by that, to claim the Government for themselves. As M. Raditch is definitely Republican and an advocate of the breaking-up of Yugoslavia into a federal organisation, the Democrats relaxed their strictly centralist programme a little and worked out a new scheme, that of M. Marinkovitch, which certainly does not mention revision in so many words, but demands it in fact. Considering the traditions of the Democratic Party, it must be admitted that the Democrats showed themselves as accommodating as was at all possible. All the same, M. Raditch was not satisfied. In spite of the parcellation of Croatia, in spite of the Fiume Agreement, he declared himself prepared to co-operate only in so far as he would consent to send to Belgrade the needful number of his deputies required for the overthrow of the Radical Party; he will not take part in a Government whose sole task it would be to put through a General Election, and still less in a "business" Government, and he does not bate one jot of his nebulous ideology. In other words, he is prepared to overthrow the Radical Government only in order to bring about an immediate General Election. But this wish cannot be shared by either M. Davidovitch or Dr. Koroshets, not to mention Dr. Spaho, who in any case plays only a subordinate part. The natural consequence of an eventual overthrow of the Radical Government by means of M. Raditch would be a Radical election cry of "Serbs, shoulder to shoulder!" and, in view of the staunch patriotism of the Serb, there is no doubt that this slogan would meet with complete success. Moreover, it was the Democrats who have been most active in decrying M. Raditch among the Serbs. It is, therefore, out of the question that M. Davidovitch should wish to precipitate a General Election merely to court defeat for his party. The latter would be practically inevitable, as—apart from external complications—disunion exists within the party itself, where the struggle between the two leaders, MM. Pribitchevitch and Davidovitch, still continues. Dr. Koroshets is in the same dilemma as M. Davidovitch. He has nothing to hope, and much to fear, from an election, especially as M. Raditch flatly declined his suggestion that members of the Opposition Bloc should not oppose one another in the electoral campaign. M. Raditch, it will be remembered, gained a considerable number of adherents in Slovenia at the last election, and the putting up of a Raditch list in Slovenia would almost automatically reduce the number of the Koroshets deputies.

The upshot of all these considerations is that at the very moment when the Raditch Party is officially announcing its advent in Belgrade the Opposition Bloc is spoken of in less and less glowing terms.

The Raditch Deputies.

In accordance with the official communiqué of the Raditch Party, it is accepted as certain that its deputies will really go to Belgrade and take an active part in the transactions of the Skupshtina. However grateful—for reasons of State—one ought to feel for such a step, it is nevertheless plain that M. Raditch does not intend to take part in any positive work there. Indeed, his party has admitted as much quite frankly and fairly, and declared that its programme and tactics remain unchanged. But with this declaration all co-operation between MM. Davidovitch and Raditch has been made practically impossible, because co-operation is only practicable when both parties agree to yield a little, more especially so if an Opposition Bloc is to be formed. How is M. Davidovitch to defend his support of M. Raditch to his Serbian electorate if M. Raditch remains intransigent, if it is only M. Davidovitch who must make concessions, and not M. Raditch as well? The Radicals would simply enjoy a walk-over. And that is why the Democrats are hesitating over their entrance into the Opposition Bloc at the very moment when its victory is almost assured.

But if M. Davidovitch is in no hurry, M. Raditch will be still more inclined to hesitate, for his pride and his power do not lie in his programme, nor in his ideas, but in the fiction that he is the implacable opponent of Belgrade. This fiction will be seriously endangered if his appearance in Belgrade were in any way to lead to a fiasco. A by no means impossible Radical-Democrat Coalition would be about the biggest fiasco that could befall him. And the longer M. Davidovitch hesitates the more possible and even likely does such a Coalition become. The announcement of M. Raditch's advent in Belgrade has often been compared to the cry of Hannibal est ante portas! But while Hannibal hesitated, his terror declined, and when he had hesitated too long he found the gates of Rome fast closed—and something analogous may yet happen to M. Raditch.

The External Position.

However tense the inner political situation may be owing to party friction, Yugoslavia's position abroad has materially improved of late, mainly thanks to the agreement concluded with Italy, which has reacted advantageously also upon relations with Bulgaria. This sounds rather incredible, especially in view of the démarche of the Great Powers in Sofia and the statements made by M. Spalaikovitch, Yugoslav Minister in Paris. But the fact remains that the Agreement with Italy undoubtedly caused the Macedonian komitaji leaders to realise that they had made a big mistake in their reckoning—in other words, that they could not count on the support of Italy. This realisation is bound to lead the Macedonians to turn their attention to more rational activities and to damp the revolutionary spirits among them. This will not come about without another crisis or two, and hence one sees the Macedonians separating more and more into two groups which are fiercely at variance one with another. When this crisis will be overpast, the tension between Yugoslavia and Bulgaria will be finally eased.

BULGARIA.

Sofia, March 10.

The Macedonian Arrests.

There has only been one topic of conversation since the beginning of March, and that has concerned the relations with Yugoslavia. For a long time the Yugoslavs have threatened to take active measures against Bulgaria because of the Macedonian Revolutionary Organisation. The Yugoslavs alleged that the Macedonians were planning an insurrection, while they also accused the Bulgarian Government of connivance. The Belgrade Press gradually became more and more menacing.

With the approach of spring Balkan quarrels always become intensified, but this year boiling-point has almost been reached. To put it plainly, Bulgaria seriously feared that the Serbs would invade their country, occupy Pernik coal mine, and perhaps Sofia itself. With the exception of a few optimists, who always said that the matter would blow over, the country at large was thoroughly alarmed. The Government shared this alarm. Towards the beginning of March meetings between M. Kalfoff, Minister for Foreign Affairs, and representatives of interested Powers became very frequent. On the night of March 2-3 140 Macedonians were arrested in Sofia and in the frontier towns bordering on Yugoslavia. On March 4 a further 160 were arrested. The Government issued an official statement in which it was said that the arrests had been made in order to prevent any disturbances of the peace. It was speedily ascertained that the arrested persons either belong to or are thought to work with the Macedonian revolutionaries. In carrying out those arrests the Government have taken a definite step against the Macedonians. It is scarcely to be doubted that their action was caused by serious apprehension regarding the Yugoslavs' intentions, coupled with a real desire to prove that their policy is one of conciliation and compromise.

Naturally the Macedonians were irritated and astonished at the Government's action. During the nine months that M. Zankoff's Government has been in power Macedonians have been greatly in favour. It thus came as a real surprise to find that the Government had decided on such a step. Except in a few isolated cases, the arrests were quietly carried out. A day or two ago all those arrested were sent to Eastern Bulgaria, where they will be interned. The Macedonian Brotherhood in Bulgaria has protested to the Government, while M. Karandjouloff, a deputy and former Judge, questioned the Prime Minister in the Sobranye concerning the legality of the arrests. M. Zankoff replied that the Government took all responsibility for an illegal act, which was, however, committed at a time when national interests were imperilled. Up to date there have been no important consequences following on the arrests. Whether the Macedonians will let the matter drop or whether they will oppose the Government is an interesting question, but public opinion, while sympathising with those arrested, does not seem to be greatly moved.

It is abroad that the Government is looking. From Belgrade news has been very meagre, but the official Press seems to consider the arrests as unimportant. Some papers point out that none of the leaders have been captured, while the general tone is that the whole thing is a bluff. It would certainly be rash for anyone to predict what real and final effects the arrests will have, but one thing is certain: M. Zankoff's Government have gone more than halfway in trying to pour oil on a situation which is extremely stormy. It is easy enough to say what the Bulgarian Government should have done and could do, but it is very difficult to advise anything if one is well acquainted with all the facts of the case. If a compromise resulting in some kind of Balkan collaboration could be brought about, then Bulgaria and Yugoslavia might be able to live peaceably side by side. Otherwise it would seem as if a continually occurring succession of pinpricks gradually leading up to an explosioin is bound to occur.

The Position of England.

It is undeniable that the influence and prestige of Great Britain have been greatly increased in Bulgaria by the events of the last few weeks. It is difficult for an Englishman to write about matters which flatter his own country; but there is absolutely no question that, rightly or wrongly, Bulgaria considers that England's advice has prevented trouble from occurring. In all walks of life there is growing up a conviction that England is gradually emerging from her policy of disinterestedness in Balkan, and especially Bulgarian, affairs. Naturally, the Labour Government comes in for a great deal of praise, and, in general, Bulgaria believes that, thanks to English ideas of justice, she will obtain fair play.

Relations with Russia.

A month ago reference was made in this letter to the fact that no official relations existed between Russia and Bulgaria. But, as days go on, Russia is recognised by one European country after the other. Greece is the latest to reopen relations. Yugoslavia is preparing to do the same thing; Roumania and Russia are holding a conference at Vienna at the end of this month. Turkey has recognised Russia some time ago. There would thus seem to be a good chance of Bulgaria being the only country in the Balkans who does not recognise the Soviet. There are obviously many and manifold difficulties in the way of recognition. The position taken up by the Third International towards M. Zankoff's Government is amongst the chief of these. The ruling authorities in Bulgaria are frankly afraid of having anything to do with the Soviet, because they fear that recognition may bring with it intrigue. That their fears may not be ill-founded is very probable. After all, Bulgarian Communist leaders are now in Russia, and are always attacking the Zankoff Administration. If the Soviet would definitely disavow the activities of the Third International, and would at the same time give pledges, capable of being carried out, that no interference with existing political conditions in Bulgaria was contemplated, then, but not before, could negotiations be opened.

Radoslavoff's Liberal Cabinet.

Just a year ago the members of Radoslavoff's Government, who brought Bulgaria into war on the side of Germany, were condemned to varying sentences of imprisonment. Now it is said that certain legal mistakes in connection with their arrest, accusation, and trial were committed. The Minister of Justice is considering the affair—which may lead either to a fresh trial or to the release of the ex-Ministers. The latter appears the most probable, but it is to be feared that such a step would call forth protests from Bulgaria's neighbours. Certainly, with external relations as strained as they are, it would appear rash to reopen the case of the ex-Liberal Ministers. It is quite understandable that sympathy is felt for General Jekoff, the former Commander-in-Chief, who voluntarily returned from abroad to face his trial, but it seems rather paradoxical if, on account of some legal point, the joint authors of a national catastrophe are to be liberated.

Unsold Tobacco.

A great amount of tobacco still remains unsold, and it is unfortunate that a projected deal with Czecho-Slovakia was unable to be carried out. Several well-known business men from Czecho-Slovakia recently visited Sofia with the object of arranging that Bulgaria should buy a large quantity of Czech machinery and other goods. In return, the Czechs were to purchase tobacco. The affair necessitated State aid, but after somewhat protracted and, it is said, badly conducted negotiations, the matter fell through. The price of the Czech manufactures is stated to have been very high. Nevertheless, from the tobacco merchant's point of view, the affair is regrettable.

ABYSSINIA.

Addis Abeba, February 8.

The Education Commission.

The most important event to be chronicled this month is the visit of the Education Commission to East Africa. This Commission—to quote the words of a statement issued by it—"is the result of the co-operative relationship of the Phelps-Stokes Fund, the International Education Board, the Governments concerned in Africa, and missionary societies in Europe and America." The Commission is visiting all the territories of East Africa at the invitation of the Governments concerned, commencing with Abyssinia and ending up with South Africa, with the object of investigating the educational needs of the native peoples of Africa and of assisting in formulating plans to meet these needs. The Commission is financed by the Phelps-Stokes Fund of America, a philanthropic trust fund which is largely utilised for educational purposes amongst the coloured races of both Africa and America. This fund financed a similar Commission to West, South, and Equatorial Africa in 1920-21, when British, French, Belgian, and Portuguese territories were visited. The report* issued subsequently by the chairman, Dr. Jesse Jones (chairman of the present Commission also), was universally recognised as a document of surpassing interest and utility.

It was unfortunate that the Commission could spare only a week for their visit to Abyssinia—time enough to discover the extraordinary interest, but all too little time to grasp even the outstanding features, of the educational problem of the country. This is not to say that the visit will be barren of result. Far from it. I had the privilege of meeting every member of the Commission. They made it abundantly clear that the problem of Abyssinia made an irresistible appeal to them. They are not men who are afraid to give rein to their imagination. On the other hand, they are practical men of affairs who have made their mark. They know the value of small beginnings, and prefer them. They have behind them a unique knowledge of African conditions, and their experience will tell them how the small beginnings should be made. I have no hesitation in saying that they will see to it that the right seed is sown in the right place.

After reading the first report of Dr. Jesse Jones referred to above, one may hazard a guess on how the Commission will approach the problem now presented to it for solution. It will study first "the economic and sociological background" of the country. It will then consider the question of the "adaptation of education to the particular needs of the individual and the community," remembering always that the Ethiopian Empire is a kaleidoscope of races and creeds, in which the social divisions range from the proud ruling class, with centuries of unconquered supremacy behind it, down to the humble slave with the unimaginative mentality of the beast of burden. It will then scrutinise such educational facilities as exist to see whether they can in any way serve as a basis on which to construct the future system of education for the country. Finally, it must investigate the all-important subject of how "the sinews of war"—finance and teachers—are to be provided.

Now, it is not necessary to possess a knowledge of the many difficulties which will confront the educational crusader in Abyssinia to realise that a few days' investigation of an extraordinarily complex problem will not carry the Commission very far. But, viewed from another angle than the mere adequacy or inadequacy of the information collected by it and the conclusions it draws, the report that will be issued eventually by the Commission will have an unusual importance and significance from the fact that it will be the work of the first international body of experts invited by the Abyssinian Government to study conditions in Abyssinia.

* "Education in Africa: A Study of West, South, and Equatorial Africa by the African Education Commission."

The Educational Situation.

Without presuming to anticipate the findings of the Commission, it is possible to indicate roughly the existing situation as regards education. The only education springing from native sources is that supplied by the priests. This is entirely confined to instruction in Ge'ez, the ancient Ethiopic, a dead language; and, besides the reading, writing, and grammar of this language, the only subjects taught are the Bible, the Psalms, hymnology, rhetoric and sometimes (but rarely) the "O Fatha Nagast" or book of the Law. The only practical contribution to the education of the people provided by the Abyssinian Church schools is that they have taught a certain number of the population to read the characters of the modern language, Amharic, of which the characters are the same as the Ge'ez characters. It is an interesting and encouraging fact that many of the people who have learned their letters in this manner have subsequently taught themselves to read and write in their own homes by securing for themselves the Bibles and other Amharic literature introduced into the country by the missions and the British and Foreign Bible Society. It should be noted that the Abyssinian Church forbids the Scriptures to be read in any language but Ge'ez.

The other sources of education are the Government School, founded by the Emperor Menelik in 1907, and various foreign mission schools. At the Government School the teachers are Copts, and the instruction is given in either English or French. Most of the mission schools are located in Addis Abeba, where there are a boys' school and a girls' school organised by the Alliance Française and the French Catholic Mission, two Swedish Protestant Mission schools, one of which has opened a class for girls, and an American Adventist school. The American Presbyterian Mission will sooner or later enter the field with a medical school and a girls' school. All these schools are carrying on good work under difficulties, but as their curriculum, like that of the Government School, is suitable only for training the clerks and interpreters required by the Government and the European population, their contribution to the problem of the education of the masses is not as yet of much value.

I do not think that the future educational system of the country will be grafted on to either the native Church schools or the mission schools. The priests are the chief enemies of progress, and the enlightenment of the clergy will almost certainly follow, not precede, the enlightenment of the general mass of the people. On the other hand, the mass of the people are fanatical Christians, who regard the missionaries as heretics who seek to undermine their faith. Since the mission schools are regarded with suspicion by the population and faced with the opposition of the native clergy, I do not think that their rate of progress is likely to be quick enough for the requirements of the situation. I am not seeking to detract from the work of the missions. I hope to see their efforts redoubled. I am convinced that the rôle, which it is theirs to fill, not only of setting a high educational standard, but also of affording an inspiring example of devotion and disinterested service, is an indispensable and worthy one. But if the general education of the masses is to be undertaken, it will have to be undertaken by the Government independently both of the priests and the missionaries. I am quite aware that the time is not ripe for the Government to take action on a large scale. But the moment has certainly come to prepare the ground and to sow the seed. The demand for education among the well-to-do classes is great—almost insistent. The inarticulate demand—if we may call it so—of the people as a whole is even greater. Without going into the question of whether the Abyssinians and their subject peoples will be happier with education than without it—a debateable point—there can be no two opinions (as one of the members of the Commission put it to me) that they require it as a simple matter of protection. They have inherited a land which, with proper development, will become a veritable Garden of Eden. It is not common sense to suppose that a "dog-in-the-manger" attitude will retard progress for much longer. Unless the Abyssinian peoples fit themselves within a measurable time to win the fruits of their inheritance, they will awake to find that the resources of their country—in fact, if not in name—have passed under the control of aliens.

Financial Difficulties.

When the Abyssinian Government comes to study this great question it is probable that the difficulties of finance will be found to overshadow all others. The ground may be explored and the small beginnings made, with outside assistance perhaps, but it is certain that no great measure of constructive reform can be undertaken in Abyssinia until the public finance of the country has been put on to a more civilised basis. Why should not a commission of financial experts, emanating from America or the League of Nations, follow in the footsteps of the Education Commission?

PERSIA.

Teheran, February 16.

Opening of the Mejliss.

On the afternoon of February 11 the Valiahd (Crown Prince) drove in state to the Parliament House and read the speech from the throne, in the absence of the Shah, declaring the Mejliss open, the National Assembly thus entering on its fifth term of office since the granting of the Constitution. The ceremony, although short, was a striking one, and the assembly of Royal Princes, Cabinet Ministers, and notables, as well as members of the diplomatic corps in their uniforms, and employees of the Government, Persian and foreign, in their Court dress, consisting of a covering long robe of Persian embroidered work and the black native "kola" (hat), made a spectacular surrounding for the sombrely dressed Deputies in the body of the hall. Seventy-two of these were present, the remaining sixty-six not having yet arrived from the provinces. The Crown Prince's speech was short, and referred briefly to the friendly relations at present existing with all the Powers, which the Government intended to continue and strengthen, and mentioned that the Government's attentions would be directed towards improving the economic situation of the country, and spreading education and justice, at the same time rejoicing that order and tranquillity had been restored and were being maintained throughout the Empire.

Talk of a Republic.

A wordy strife continues to be waged in the local Press regarding the merits of a republican government in Persia in place of the existing monarchy, in view of the frequent and long visits of the Shah to the gayer capitals of Europe. It is significant that, whereas one newspaper was suspended a short time ago for publishing an article against His Majesty, such publications are now of almost daily occurrence, and the papers printing them are allowed to circulate with impunity. There is no doubt that these repeated and prolonged stays of the Shah in Europe (three in the last five years) are greatly alienating his people's sympathies, and have caused his popularity to wane very considerably.

Reception by the Japanese Consul General.

The head of the Japanese Mission to Persia, M. Nuida, Japanese Consul-General at Calcutta, gave a big dinner last Monday, to which over sixty guests sat down, including the Prime Minister and members of his Cabinet, the diplomatic corps, and leading members of the European and American communities in Teheran, the rest of whom were invited after dinner.

Aeroplanes for the Army.

Last Sunday it was announced in the Press, somewhat prematurely, it appears, that four of the twelve aeroplanes purchased in France for the Persian Army, which have recently been landed in Bushire, would fly to Teheran and arrive here the following day, piloted by the French mechanics who accompanied them from France, and bringing with them the Chief of Staff, General Prince Amanollah Mirza, who has returned from France; the Minister of Public Works, Haji Ezz ul Mamalek; and Mr. Mitchell, the American Adviser, who a month ago accompanied the latter to Shiraz and Bushire to inspect the roads in the south, as mentioned in my last letter. The planes, however, did not materialise, and although the papers state that they will arrive here in the course of the next few days, it is doubtful whether they will be seen yet awhile. Their arrival, whenever it takes place, will prove an interesting event, as this flight will be the first that has ever taken place over that part of the country between the Persian Gulf and Teheran by way of Shiraz.

General News.

Following the recognition by the new British Labour Cabinet of the Soviet Government (which, by the way, is very favourably commented on in Persian circles, and has naturally been received with no little satisfaction by the Russians here), the Russian Minister, M. Shumiatsky, paid an official call on the British Minister, which was returned by Sir Percy Loraine a few days later.

A new set of Shah's head postage stamps have made their appearance, having been placed on sale at the Post Office a fortnight ago. So far, only some of the lower values have been issued, the remainder not having yet arrived here. This new issue will be welcomed as a pleasant change from the old issue, which has become antiquated, having been in circulation no fewer than twelve years, during which period it has been subjected to innumerable surcharges.

M. Pire, the Acting Director-General of Posts since M. Molitor's retirement two years ago, has been appointed Postmaster at Bushire, and his place here has been taken by Mushir Moazzam, who was Minister of Posts and Telegraphs in Seyed Zia ed Din's Cabinet after the coup d'état of 1921. Thus a position which has been held exclusively by Belgian officials for the past few decades now passes into the hands of a Persian.

More rain and snow have fallen, and the prospects for next season's crops are excellent throughout the country.

Disastrous floods in Arabistan have caused much havoc and damage, especially in the neighbourhood of Mohammerah and Ahwaz, with which telegraphic communication was interrupted for a fortnight.

INDEPENDENT EGYPT.

The formal opening of Egypt's new Parliament, which took place on Saturday in the presence of King Fuad, was in every way a brilliant ceremony, befitting the setting of the seal of constitutionalism on independent Egypt. Public enthusiasm ran high; ovations in the crowded streets and in the Chamber testified to the popularity of the Sovereign, and the Government has reason to congratulate itself on the favourable auspices under which it approaches its task of keeping Egypt by her own unaided efforts in line with the progressive nations of the world. The Speech from the Throne, read by Zaghloul Pasha, was characteristic of the new Prime Minister; it was couched in moderate terms, but made no attempt to burke the issues before the country. The task before Parliament, it said, was to realise the complete independence of Egypt, and it declared the sacred and indissoluble union of Throne and people in this task. Government was ready to enter with Great Britain into negotiations "free of all restrictions," with a view to realising the national aspirations in regard to Egypt and the Sudan, and was full of hope of achieving this end through the force of right and with the aid of the Almighty. Details of the Government's programme were then given, and finally the hope was expressed that Egypt would soon enter the League of Nations, to crown the country's political liberty. For the moment "complete independence" is Egypt's political password, in spite of the fact that Zaghloul Pasha was able to declare at the dinner on the eve of the opening of Parliament that the Government had hitherto been subjected to no foreign influence whatever, and had been left completely free in its administration of the affairs of the country. Such freedom, it might be thought, would constitute the practical test of independence, at least so far as Egypt need concern herself on the subject in the immediate future, in view of the somewhat formidable programme of domestic legislation and reforms awaiting her attention. In this matter, however, the Government must be regarded as not a free agent owing to the stress laid on the failure of previous Cabinets to give adequate effect to Egyptian aspirations. As if to remove any doubt on this point, circulars have been distributed and posted throughout Cairo warning the Government that, if the nation's demands be not quickly realised, "our weapons are still sharp and our bullets are still ready." Such threats can, of course, be regarded as the utterances of a few irresponsible hot-heads, who are not likely to derive much encouragement from the nation as a whole. The possibility of any serious breach of the peace will arise only if speeches in Parliament are couched in sufficiently unmeasured terms to make the hot-heads imagine that they really have the country behind them in any attempt to secure "the nation's demands" by force.

That there are breakers ahead in the way of Anglo-Egyptian relations goes without saying. It would be foolish to ignore them, although we may find some consolation in the truth of the adage that it takes two to make a quarrel. There was something more than a message of perfunctory congratulation in the telegram sent by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald to Zaghloul Pasha. It assured the Egyptian Prime Minister of the good will and friendship with which Great Britain welcomes the youngest of Parliaments, and of the British Government's confidence that the day of the opening would be found to mark an important step in the advance of Egypt, the inheritor of the oldest civilisation, amongst the company of the free and progressive peoples of the world. Mr. MacDonald expressed the conviction that Egypt and Great Britain are destined to be associated in a close and friendly relationship, and it was with the desire of seeing this relationship established upon a lasting basis satisfactory to both countries that the British Government signified its readiness now and at all times to negotiate with the Egyptian Government. It is to the "close and friendly relationship" that Egyptians are inclined to take exception. They find difficulty in realising that their country plays in the scheme of the British Empire a part analogous to that played by Alexandria in Egypt. The simile is not to be pressed, but it may help to an appreciation of the position if Egyptians were to try to picture to themselves their own attitude towards a separation of their chief port from its hinterland. What is to be aimed at is an arrangement that will give legitimate satisfaction to Egyptian aspirations without seriously weakening the British Empire. That such an arrangement is possible may be inferred from Zaghloul Pasha's own admission that in spite of "incomplete" independence the Government had been left "completely free" in its administration of the affairs of the country. If both sides are resolved not to jeopardise the close and friendly relationship, it is certain that as time passes there will be opportunity for the adjustment of questions which, while passion or unfriendliness exists on one side or the other, seem to embody all the elements of a serious crisis.

Of the utmost importance is it that there should be no undue haste on Egypt's part to raise the question of the Sudan. It is to be feared that few Egyptians have tried to make themselves acquainted with the real feeling in Great Britain regarding the future of the Sudan, with the result that the nation is exposing itself to a rude awakening if it imagines, from the quietness of the demeanour which has hitherto characterised the refusal to discuss the question, that it has only to be a little more insistent to gain its point. There is a great difference between acquiescing in the claim of the Egyptians to govern themselves and in conceding their demand to have sole jurisdiction over the Sudanese. The Sudan, it has to be remembered, revives memories of Mahdist days and Gordon's sacrifice. There was no unwillingness to a nominal partnership with Egypt in the administration of the country, but it was an implied condition that the character, methods, and standard of that administration should be British. The only change, therefore, that can be admitted in regard to the Sudan, if it is to cease to be British, is that it should become Sudanese. Great Britain would rightly be held to have proved false to her trust if she were to hand over the country to Egypt in the face of the undisguised dislike of the great majority of the Sudanese for the Egyptians. On the other hand, Great Britain recognises that the Sudan, in regard to the question of the Nile water supply, is of vital concern to Egypt, and for this reason is willing and eager to remove all anxiety on this subject from Egyptian minds. A settlement of the water problem entirely in keeping with Egyptian interests is a comparatively simple matter, if it is not unwisely linked with the question of possession. With the latter are bound up the life-and-death interests of the Sudanese, and, although Great Britain in certain circumstances may easily renounce what is her own, she will not be found on this occasion sacrificing the interests of others and exposing Egypt and the Sudan to the certainty of war. We are confident that Egyptians themselves will realise on reflection in how much stronger a position they will be in regard to this "reserved question" when they are able to show that in Egypt the withdrawal of British advice or supervision has in no way lowered the standard or the efficiency of the administration.

TURKEY, THE KHALIFATE, AND ISLAM.

Nothing that the Turks in their reforming zeal can accomplish or attempt is likely to give rise to more discussion than the abolition of the Turkish Khalifate. The establishment of a republic is a matter affecting Turkey alone; in expelling the Khalif and declaring that the Khalifate is no longer any concern of Turkey's, the Turkish National Assembly has thrown a bombshell into the camp of Islam. In any consideration of the subject, it is necessary to keep the two aspects of the question—the political and the religious—distinct. The wisdom of Turkey's action may be debated from the point of view of her own interests; her right to do as she pleases with what is her own can hardly be challenged. Whatever the formula that found acceptance in the National Assembly, its effect is merely to dissociate the Khalifate from Turkey and to forbid the holder of the office to live on Turkish soil. The attitude of the Turks will presumably be that, if the world of Islam wishes still to regard Prince Abdul Mejid as the lawful Khalif, it is not their affair. The possibility of complications arises if religious feeling in Turkey should be strong enough to require recognition of the Khalif in Mosque prayers.

The reasons that have carried weight with the Angora Assembly are not far to seek. New Turkey is to be very new; anything savouring of old traditions, particularly of the Imperialist régime, to which the Deputies attribute all Turkey's troubles, has to go. The Sultan-Khalif was the personification of the old order; and the half measure that abolished the Sultanate while retaining the Khalifate was regarded as out of keeping with the new conditions. A clean sweep was demanded; it was easy to think of the Khalif as a rallying point for intrigue against the republican régime, and easier still to excite feeling against a number of individuals who could be represented as superfluous luxuries, Princes and Princesses of the Imperial House, who were a source of expense and conferred no benefit on the country. Other aspects of the Khalifate were either entirely ignored or dismissed as of no significance. The Assembly was probably in no mood to reflect that it was mainly the possession by Turkey of the Khalifate that secured the favourable terms of the Treaty of Lausanne; but for the Turkish Khalifate there would have been no pressing haste for peace with Turkey at any price, at least as far as Great Britain was concerned. Moreover, there can be little doubt that, whatever the religious theory regarding the Khalifate, Sultan Abdul Hamid had used the office to enhance Turkish prestige in the world of Islam.

Against this latter contention it is pointed out that, until the Indian Khalifate agitation, little was heard of the religious side of the Sultan's hold on the Faithful. He was Khalif in virtue of the fact that Turkey was the strongest Mohammedan State, and the stronger or the more in evidence she became the greater the hold of the Sultan on Moslem imagination. The history of the Khalifate is cited in proof of the very slight appeal that it made to Moslems in general. The Shiahs have dispensed with it altogether; the Sunnis have found no contradiction between their insistence on the indispensability of the Sacred Office and almost complete indifference towards anything that happened to it. The rights of the Koreish tribe in regard to the post have not been upheld; holders of the title have been done to death and usurpers tolerated, as if the Khalifate were as remote from the minds of Moslems as the Papacy or the Buddhist incarnation.

The difference of opinion existing among Moslems themselves regarding the Khalifate is well exemplified in the views on the present situation held by Mr. Ameer Ali, one of the foremost exponents of Islamic law, although not a Sunni himself, and the Imam of the Ahmadia Mosque, who contributes a letter on the subject in this issue. The former holds that the Prince Abdul Mejid is still the Khalif, and that the attempt to abolish the Turkish Khalifate may lead to the disintegration of Islam. He argues that the ex-Sultan Wahid ed-Din forfeited the Sacred Office when he abandoned his capital and betook himself for safety to an "enemy" country. The Khalif Abdul Mejid was then duly elected, the sacramental oath of fealty was solemnly taken to him by the Deputies sent from Angora to attend his installation, and the Khutba was read in his name in all Sunni mosques. It follows, continues Mr. Ameer Ali, "that until any breach of the religious law can be proved against Abdul Mejid, and he is deposed by the general consensus of the Sunni congregation, expressed by their divines in a formal synod, he is still the lawful Khalif." The Imam Nayyar, on the other hand, puts forward the suggestion that "the steps taken by the Turkish Assembly to abolish a nominal Khalifate will be beneficial not only to Turkey and the Moslem world," but will also remove a great political menace to the European rulers of Moslem lands. The Turkish Khalifate, he holds, has been useless to the Turks as well as to the world of Islam, and he regards its abolition as a wise step. These arguments, it is true, lead up to the contention that the moment is ripe for a spiritual Khalifate which will be divorced from temporal power, and the Imam Nayyar advances the claims of the founder of the Ahmadia movement to be such a Khalif. For this reason, it may be supposed, not much weight will be attached in the Moslem world to his other arguments.

Again, the fact that King Hussein of the Hejaz has had himself proclaimed Khalif while on a visit to Transjordania shows what little importance is attached by some Moslems to the considerations that weigh so strongly with Mr. Ameer Ali. His action will be held to substantiate the contention that the Khalifate as a Moslem institution has more claims to be regarded as a political asset than as a spiritual office. While Prince Abdul Mejid summons the Sunni world to rally to his support, the guardian of the Holy Cities has entirely ignored him and has revived an Arab Khalifate. If a Moslem Synod were to decide that, in view of the refusal of the Turks to retain the Khalifate, or to allow the Khalif to reside in Turkey, the position of Prince Abdul Mejid as Khalif had become impossible, it might well be that it would regard the claims of King Hussein to the office as superior to those of all other aspirants. His action, however, in assuming the Khalifate without waiting for the sanction of some recognised body of opinion in Islam can hardly fail to arouse antagonism. In India, where the spiritual side of Islam appears to have been more strongly developed than among any other community of Moslems, there is likely to be no little opposition, if only because dissatisfaction exists over the treatment of pilgrims to Mecca. On the other hand, if the retention of a Turkish Khalif were adjudged impracticable, Islamic purists, however much they resent his premature usurpation, might have to admit that law and tradition forbade the claims of King Hussein to be passed over. He will certainly meet with no support in Egypt, which, in its present mood, will not easily overlook the fact that, from the point of view of numbers, it has stepped into the forefront of independent Moslem States. Already the Egyptian ulema have issued a manifesto addressed to the Moslem world, recommending a general congress at which the question of the Khalifate will be settled according to law, and warning Islam against any action taken before the meeting of the congress.

Whatever decision may ultimately be taken regarding the Khalifate, it is evident that the action of the Turkish Government will have interesting effects. Turkey herself, it would appear, must be influenced for good or for ill. The Khalifate in itself may have become an empty institution; but its abolition will either bring about for Turkey the good anticipated by the Angora Assembly, or it will be resented by the more devout Moslems among the Turks and provide them with a weapon against the Republic. In the general world of Islam the prominence now given to the Khalifate will compel Moslems to devote some consideration to the office with a view either to its abolition, or to strengthening it by endowing it with powers or prestige which will command for it the greater respect of the Faithful.

THE KHALIFATE.

To the Editor of The Near East.

Sir,—I shall be obliged if you will kindly publish the following lines in your valuable paper:—

(1) The Khalifate or Khalafat means succession to the Holy Prophet Mohammed to continue his work on the earth. The Prophet said:—

(a) "There will be Prophethood among you as long as Allah wishes.

(b) "Then there will be Khalifate.

(c) "Then there will be kingdom of force.

(d) "Then again will be Khalifate."

The Prophet is also reported to have said that there would be Khalifate for thirty years, and after that there will be only Sultanate—temporal power.

According to these traditions the time of Khalifate—the second period—ended with the first four successors of Mohammed, and after Ali, the fourth Khalif, temporal Khalifate went to temporal kings, and the spiritual Khalafat was vested in those reformers and teachers that were raised in Islam according to the promise at the head of each century Hegira.

(2) Although the Moslem kings of various dynasties claimed to be Khalifs of the kingdom of force, yet there has never been one acknowledged head of all Islam. The abolition of Khalifate by Turkey is, therefore, simply the overthrow of a nominal power which of late altogether ceased to be of any use to the Moslem world. On the other hand, it created considerable mischief between Turkey and such of the European Powers who have Moslem subjects.

(3) How can the Turkish Khalif be the Khalif of the Moslem world when Persia, Hejaz, Morocco, Yemen, Nejd, and a considerable number of other Moslem people do not recognise his authority. It is wise of the Turks to do away with an office that has proved to be useless for them as well as for the world of Islam.

The Turkish Chargé d'Affaires in London (H.E. Yussuf Kemal Bey) the other day, during a conversation, remarked:—"Islam has gone deep down into Turkish blood. The people at Angora are true Moslems, and whatever they have done is for the good and progress of Islam."

(4) From my personal knowledge of Islam and the Moslem world, I can safely say that the steps taken by the Turkish Assembly to abolish a nominal Khalifate will be beneficial not only to Turkey and the Moslem world, but would remove a great political menace to the French, Italian, Dutch, and more especially the British rulers of Moslem lands. Moreover, instead of mutual suspicions between the rulers and the ruled, a healthy co-operation and friendship to the advantage of both sides will spring up.

(5) As to the future Khalif, this being the fourth period according to the tradition referred to above, the Khalif of the age is the promised Messiah and Mahdi, who is to leave temporal kingdoms to the temporal rulers—be they Moslems or non-Moslems—and as lawful successor of the Holy Prophet he is to promulgate Islam through peaceful means. To me, Ahmad, the inspired founder of the Ahmadia movement, is such a Khalif.

I am, etc.,

A. R. Nayyar, Imam.

The Ahmadia Mosque, 63, Melrose Road, S.W.18, March 10.

To the Editor of The Near East.

Sir,—Until the wording of the actual formula abolishing the Khalifate has been published it is perhaps premature to discuss the merits or demerits of the Turkish action in this connection. But, if one may judge from the reports in the Press, the Angora Government seem hardly to have realised that (a) it was the Khalifate, and the Khalifate alone, which induced the Allies in general and the British Government in particular to grant the Turks the terms which they did at Lausanne; (b) the existence or non-existence of the said Khalifate is certainly not a matter which concerns only Turkey.

It may have been war weariness which prevented the Allies from capturing Angora and dictating terms there. But war weariness had nothing to do with the decision to evacuate Constantinople, which was brought about by the conclusion, somewhat belated certainly, that the Khalifate agitation in India was something more than a political "stunt." The Ghazi Mustapha Kemal Pasha is reported to have stated that the strong sword of the Turks had obtained the good terms which were agreed to at Lausanne; but had there been no Khalifate agitation in India the Straits would still be in the Allies' keeping, and the Turks would not have been allowed to regain any footing in Europe. Such is the case, and it is incomprehensible how the Turks could have cast aside as of no value a weapon which has been of such assistance to them. At least, this is the opinion of a sympathetic observer as I am, and their action is all the more incomprehensible in view of the remarkable foresight which the Ghazi and his associates have shown in all else, both as regards the seat of government and the separation of Church and State, so to speak. It is one thing to work for a Republic and an elected President (although this form of government is an entirely new departure in the East), but it is quite another matter to abolish an office which has hitherto been the means of uniting a large sect of Moslems. Unless I am much mistaken, therefore, Turkey will now find herself isolated and confronted not only by Christian Europe (with no longer any fear of a Moslem fraternity united against her), but also by rival and jealous co-religionists, ready and eager to challenge Turkey's pretensions to leadership.

In discussing these religious doctrines of the Mohammedans, it is usual to say that the Moslems themselves are the only persons to be consulted. In this case such a stereotyped statement hardly applies, and if I may be allowed to express an opinion, I should say that it would have been far wiser had the Turkish Government asked themselves the question: Is it to our advantage to have all Christendom and many of our own co-religionists against us, or had we not better preserve the Khalifate and chance the intrigues of a Khalifate at Constantinople, and thus preserve unity amongst the Sunni sect? To my mind, there can be only one answer, as follows:—

Although we have created a Republic in Turkey, we, as Moslems, are anxious to promote and assist in the upkeep of the Khalifate, and the best means is the election of a Khalif by delegates of the entire Sunni brotherhood. Further, we see no objection to making Constantinople the headquarters of the Sunni faith, and we are fully prepared to furnish our share of endowment. Should Cairo, Mecca, or any other seat of religious government be decided on, we accept the decision.

The Turks will probably reply, "We are the best judges of our own affairs." I can only say, "Tant mieux for Christian Europe, tant pis for the Turks and the Moslem world." Moreover, I am convinced that many of my Mohammedan friends will agree with me.—I am, etc.,

COLES PASHA.

Biarritz, March 12.

THE ARAB HORSE SOCIETY.

The general meeting of members was held in the Council Chamber of the Agricultural Hall on Saturday, March 8. The following ten members were elected by members of the Society to fill the vacancies on the Council:—Cecil, Lt.-Col., R.E., D.S.O.; Hartington, The Marquis of; Hough, C. W.; Laird, C. W.; Leigh, Col. J. Hamilton; Lewis, Sidney W.; MacLachlan, Hugh F.; Medcalf, Major Sydney A.; Ollivant, Major G. B.; Toms, Major Charles B., O.B.E.

Mr. T. C. Armitage has been elected president for 1924, and Brig.-Gen. C. Templer, C.M.G., C.I.E., vice-president for this year and president in 1925.

The King has given Mr. C. E. Dupuis, late Adviser to the Egyptian Ministry of Public Works, authority to wear the Grand Cordon of the Order of the Nile, conferred on him by the King of Egypt, in recognition of valuable services.

The Regent of Abyssinia, Ras Tafari, having received an invitation from the British Government, is expected to visit London in the course of the summer. He is also paying an official visit to Rome and Paris.

EGYPTIANS IN BRITAIN.

The Egyptian colony in the United Kingdom gave a tea of honour at the Hotel Metropole, London, on March 15 to welcome the arrival of Aziz Izzet Pasha, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Majesty the King of Egypt.

After conveying to His Majesty the King their sincerest devotions through his representative, the following resolution was recorded by the colony:—"That this meeting of Egyptians resident in Great Britain and Ireland held to welcome the arrival of His Excellency Aziz Izzet Pasha does humbly express its devoted greetings to His Majesty the King of Egypt, and conveys to the Egyptian nation, led by her great patriot Saad Pasha Zaghloul, its solid support for her right and just cause, which is the complete independence of Egypt and the Sudan. The meeting solemnly considers that Egypt and Sudan, by history, by language, by tradition, as well as by the attributes of nationality and common interests, are one indivisible unit, and that the Sudan being the source of life to Egypt, its separation from Egypt will be fatal to her existence."

The Egyptian Minister, after thanking them for their kind invitation, emphasised the duties and responsibilities of the young Egyptians who are studying abroad. He reminded them that the Egyptian nation awaits the return of those students who are in foreign countries to associate themselves with those who are working for the moral and material reconstruction of Egypt. He said that the present Egypt, with its unique natural advantages and resources and intelligent and brave inhabitants, played a fundamental part in the early history of humanity, and it is now awakening to play an important part in the near future. It will be the duty of the students who have had experience of European and British Universities to lend their energy and experience in the various means which constitute cultured life. Thus, in every domain of science, literature, commerce, economics, arts, and music a great field for serious reconstruction is awaiting their efforts.

Egypt has proved more than once in the nineteenth century that she can be a big and prosperous organised nation. The great founder of modern Egypt, Mohammed Ali, commenced the building of Egypt, and during his monumental reign the regeneration of Egypt received a powerful stimulus which, in a short time, invited the tribute and admiration of the civilised world. The efforts of the Great Ismail Pasha made modern Egypt a part of Europe. His skilful administration and moral and material reforms did not confine themselves to the upper and lower provinces of Egypt, but extended to its Sudanese provinces as far south as the equatorial lakes, where order and peace were established.

Under the reign of His Majesty King Fuad I. Egypt is looking forward to a happier future and prospects. His enlightened guidance and devotion to the welfare of his people and his country have earned him already a lasting place in the history of independent Egypt.

The Minister said that he would not like this happy opportunity to pass without paying a due tribute to Egypt's great leader, Zaghloul Pasha, who, with exemplary courage, energy, and self-denial, has been leading the country with extreme ability in the way of realising her cherished and just cause.

At the end of the meeting cheers were given for King Fuad, and a telegram of devotion was sent to His Majesty.

MARRIAGE OF SIR ALEXANDER KAY MUIR AND MLLE. NADEJDA STANCIOFF.

The marriage of Sir Alexander Kay Muir, Bart., of Deanston and Blair Drummond, Perthshire, with Mlle. Nadejda Stancioff, eldest daughter of Dr. Dimitri Stancioff, Bulgarian Minister in London, was celebrated at the Brompton Oratory on March 17. Dr. Stancioff gave his daughter away, and M. Ivan Stancioff acted as best man. Attendance at the ceremony, which took place at 8.45 a.m., to enable Sir Alexander and Lady Muir to leave the same morning for the Continent, was restricted to the nearest relatives of the bride and bridegroom and a few friends, among those present being Dr. and Mme. Stancioff, the Mlles. Feodora and Hélène Stancioff, M. Iván Stancioff, General Sir Ian and Lady Hamilton (sister of the bridegroom), Mrs. Anderson, Sir William Tyrrell and Miss Tyrrell, Sir Edward and Lady Boyle, the Dowager Lady Boyle, Lady Grogan, M. Felix Guépin, Mr. and Mrs. Leland Buxton, and the staff of the Bulgarian Legation. From the Oratory the wedding party went to the Bulgarian Legation, where breakfast was served. Sir Alexander and Lady Muir left subsequently for Paris, en route to Sienna and Rome. They will return at the end of April to Blair Drummond.

Great interest has been aroused in the marriage of Miss Stancioff, who in the few years that have passed since the Armistice has obtained a European reputation through her presence at the Conferences in Paris, Genoa, and Lausanne, where, as Secretary-Interpreter to the Bulgarian Delegation, she distinguished herself by her mastery of languages and a scholarly gift of interpretation. In 1923 Mlle. Stancioff, who speaks five foreign languages as fluently as her own, was appointed Secretary to the Bulgarian Legation in Washington, but did not proceed to America, preferring to remain in her unofficial position as private secretary to Dr. Stancioff, a post that she had previously held in Vienna, St. Petersburg, Paris, and Rome.

OBITUARY.

Captain Harold Lyon Thomson, who died on March 13, was an Arabic and French scholar. He was Consul-General for Albania.

The death is announced of Mrs. Ruete, by birth Princess Salme, of the house of the Imams of Muscat. Her father, Seyyid Said, who died in 1856, was the ruler of Muscat, who made Zanzibar his capital and is reckoned as the first Sultan of Zanzibar. It was to Seyyid Said that the fame of Zanzibar is due.

Announcement is made of the death at Toulon, on March 15, of General Pellé, French High Commissioner at Constantinople. His brilliant military services during the War were recognised by his appointment after the Armistice to Turkey. He was also one of the representatives of France at the Conferences of Lausanne.

Mr. George Pollard Devey, who died suddenly at Streatham on March 11, at the age of 61, was in the Consular Service for nearly forty years at various places in the Near East. He was Acting Consul-General at Beyrout in 1906. During the War he served for four years in the Prisoners of War Information Bureau, and was later in charge of the Consulate at Jeddah, retiring on pension in 1920.

NOTES AND NEWS.

Bulgarian Debt Arrangement.

It was not anticipated that there would be much difficulty in regard to the negotiations which the Bulgarian Financial Delegation have been conducting in respect of the question of the payment of coupons and drawn bonds to British bondholders, and the mission, it is satisfactory to learn, has reached an agreement on the subject with the Council of Foreign Bondholders. The arrangement made in 1921 was that payment should be made in French francs, but the variations of the exchange have made that medium unwelcome to the bondholders, and the question at issue was therefore the currency which should replace French francs. The arrangement made is that British holders shall receive 33 per cent. of the face value of coupons and drawn bonds either in sterling or Dutch florins, and a similar arrangement has been made with French holders.

The Exchanges.

When one writes under this generic heading it is apt to be a trifle misleading, for any reference to the exchanges in these days must be confined mainly to the vicissitudes of the French franc. A week ago it seemed as if the French exchange had definitely taken the downward path, which might lead anywhere, but to-day the position has entirely changed, and the franc, instead of being quoted at over 118, now stands in the region of 87, and, so far as can be seen, promises to rise still further, though it is obviously very unsafe to prophesy with regard to the exchanges after the surprises that have already been experienced. Among the reasons assigned for the recovery of the French exchange, the main is British and American support. But whatever be the cause matters little; it is the result that is important. Even the most optimistic would have had good grounds for pessimism if the depreciation of the franc had continued.

The Coming Zagreb Fair.

There are so many fairs and trade exhibitions of one kind and another nowadays that it is not surprising if the business community is inclined rather to disparage this means of commercial development. Beyond question, there is far too much of this kind of thing, and the result is that fairs and exhibitions that could really serve a useful purpose run the risk of being neglected by British firms. I think it worth while on this account to put in a word on behalf of the coming Zagreb Fair, which is to be held from April 27 to May 5. Last year French exhibitors did a very substantial amount of trade, and paved the way for future commercial progress. Czech, German, and Austrian firms have also been very prominent at this fair in the past, but the part played by British trade has been almost negligible. It is another example of the way in which we allow our competitors an advantage in the Near East markets. The scope for trade in the region served by this fair is, as a matter of fact, very considerable. The British Commercial Secretary at Belgrade in a recent report gives a long list of articles likely to obtain a ready sale in Yugoslavia, among them being cottons, linens, and woollen fabrics, wearing apparel, pharmaceutical products, perfumery, automobiles, books, music, and high-class wines and spirits.

The British Empire Exhibition.

In a little over five weeks this much-heralded exhibition will be in full swing. There is no doubt that it will present a wonderful spectacle—will be, in fact, one of the most rousing tributes to man's genius for organisation that has ever been framed; one, indeed, well worthy to rank as an easy first among all the exhibitions that have ever been held. Of the attraction that it will hold out to the multitude there is naturally no doubt, and there will be few in this country who have the opportunity to go to Wembley who are likely to stay away. I am not quite so confident about visitors from abroad; indeed, I am inclined to think that estimates of their number are likely to prove much above the mark. After all, it is not only in this country that purchasing power has been very definitely reduced by the War; it is a universal phenomenon, and one effect must surely be to affect attendance at events like the exhibition.

Ottoman Railway Report.

Encouraging results are shown in the report of the Ottoman Railway from Smyrna to Aidin for the half-year ended December 31, 1923. Besides the accounts for that period, the report includes the accounts from Smyrna for the twelve months to that date. The gross receipts for the year amounted to £435,921, the expenditure being £260,841, the working profit, before charging London and Constantinople expenses being £175,080. It would obviously be impossible to make a real comparison with the results of the previous year, but it may be of interest to set out the figures. The gross receipts were £340,956, as against an expenditure of £229,688, the working profit before charging London and Constantinople expenses being £111,268. Some progress was made during the year in carrying out the heavy repairs that are necessary. The estimates for the replacement of buildings, engines, and rolling stock amount to a considerable sum, and it is stated that the expenditure will necessarily require to be spread over a number of years. During the second half of last year the working of the line was, on the whole, fairly satisfactory, taking into account the adverse factors affecting the situation. It is pointed out, however, that it is evident that some time must elapse before normal conditions again obtain; but the directors are hopeful that, given stable conditions in Asia Minor, something akin to the former prosperity of the line will eventually ensue.

Ottoman Railway Preference Scheme.

Particulars have already been given in these columns of the proposals for the cancellation of the debenture arrears of the railway. Details are now given in a circular of a scheme for dealing with the preference capital of the company. It is proposed that the outstanding arrears of preference dividends up to and including that due on May 1 next should be cancelled. and that the dividends should henceforward be non-cumulative. In return it is proposed to raise the preference dividend from 6 to 9 per cent.

The Indian Market.

A comprehensive series of lectures on British Empire trade has been arranged at the City of London College. The section devoted to India consists of a series of four lectures, the first of which, by Sir Charles H. Armstrong, chairman of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company, on "Indian Transport and Communications," was given on March 17. The other lectures in this section are on "Indian Industrial Expansion," by Sir C. Ernest Low, K.C.I.E., I.C.S., retired, on March 24; "Indian Trade," by Mr. H. A. F. Lindsay, C.B.E., I.C.S., Indian Trade Commissioner, on March 31; and "Indian Currency and Finance," by Lord Meston, K.C.S.I., LL.D., I.C.S., retired, on April 7. The lectures are specially intended for merchants who are interested in the practical development of Empire trade.

THE FINANCES AND TRADE OF PALESTINE.

II.—The Budget.

Statements have appeared from time to time in the Press showing comparisons between the taxation of Palestine at the present time and before the war and between the taxation of Palestine and Syria. Most of these statements ignore important considerations, and are quite valueless. For instance, the published figures of the revenue of Palestine now include the receipts of the railways. But there were no State railways before the War and there are none now in Syria. It is absurd to treat this revenue as though it were additional taxation imposed upon the people. Again, the present Administration has established a telephone service, the gross revenue of which is £E25,000. This sum is included in the Budget, but it obviously ought not to be treated as though it were the imposition of a fresh tax. There are other similar cases.

The Budget from 1921 to 1924.

The first complete financial year of the Civil Administration was from April 1, 1921, to March 31, 1922. The revenue for that year was £E1,997,000. The expenditure was £E1,881,000. In the following year, 1922-1923, the revenue fell to £E1,764,000, and the expenditure was £E1,837,000, showing a deficit of £E73,000. It was, therefore, necessary to enforce the most rigid economies. The estimates for the present year, 1923-24, are: Revenue, £E1,787,000; expenditure, £E1,783,000. It seems probable that the year will end without a deficit.

Next year, however, the charge upon Palestine, under the Peace Treaty with Turkey, in respect of the pre-War Ottoman Debt, begins to be payable. On the other hand, a payment of £E98,000 has been made this year out of revenue, being one instalment of the purchase money for the Jaffa-Jerusalem railway. This payment might properly be charged against capital, and a similar sum will not be payable out of next year's revenue. It will be provided from surplus balances. But the debt annuity that will have to be paid next year will be considerably more than this £E98,000, so that the financial situation will then be more difficult, rather than easier, unless the revenue expands.

The Yield of the Tithe.

The financial difficulties of the Government are largely due to the great diminution in the revenue provided by the cultivators in the form of tithe. The collections under this head have been as follows: — 1920-21, £E391,000; 1921-22, £E279,000; 1922-23, £E203,000; 1923-24, £E180,000 (estimated).

This reduction is due mainly to the fall in market prices, and to the very great reduction in the redemption prices upon which tithe is payable. The figures of the redemption prices are as follows, in millièmes:—Wheat has fallen from 22½ in 1920 to 6 4-5 in 1923; barley has declined from 13 to 6; simsim from 50 to 16 7-10, durra from 12 to 5½, and olive oil from 90 per kilo to 51. Oranges, on the other hand, have steadily risen from 100 per case to 177. The redemption prices of grain are greatly below those obtained in the market. The following figures show the prices per kilo in millièmes in August last as follows:—(1) Redemption price (August), (2) producers' (spot), (3) wholesale, (4) retail: Wheat, 6.8, 8.8, 9.9, 10.8; barley, 6, 7.3, 8.4, 10.3; sesame, 16.7, 19, 20, 22; durra, 5.5, 6, 6.8, 7.5. (December prices have been taken. Since September, wheat has risen 12 per cent., barley 10 per cent., and durra 8 per cent; sesame fell 1 per cent.)

Taking redemption prices as 100, the relative prices are as follows:—Redemption price, 100 per cent.; producers', 114 per cent.; wholesale, 125 per cent.; retail, 137 per cent. In terms of percentage, it may be stated that the retailer's price is divided as follows:—83 to producer, 8 to wholesale dealers, 9 to retail dealers.

The Railways.

Railway revenue also showed a marked decline in the last financial year, compared with the previous year. This was due, partly to the withdrawal of the greater part of the garrison and the consequent reduction in military traffic, partly to motor competition, and partly to a decline in trade. The figures were: 1921-22, £E557,000; 1922-23, £E381,000.

This situation was met by drastic economies. The number of the railway staff had to be cut down from 4,921 in 1921 to 4,071 in 1922, and to 2,365 in 1923. The expenditure of the railways was reduced from £E527,000 in 1921-22 to £E411,000 in 1922-23, and is estimated to be £E386,000 in the present year. In April, 1923, fares and freights were very largely reduced. But the consequent increase of traffic brought, as was anticipated, a growth, instead of a decline, of total revenue. The estimate of revenue for the current year 1923-24 is £E415,000, showing a profit of nearly £E30,000.

These figures do not include, however, any charge in respect of interest and sinking fund on the capital spent upon the railways. On the other hand, the railways are not credited with the value of the services which they render, without payment, to the other Departments of the Administration. These figures do not include, also, the revenue and expenditure of the Sinai Railway, from Kantara to Rafa, which are separate from the accounts of the Palestine railways, and bring neither profit nor loss to the Palestine taxpayer.

Tobacco.

Another cause of the decline in revenue is the increase in the growth of tobacco in Palestine, and the consequent decrease in the amount imported. In the long run, the development of tobacco cultivation assists the agriculturist, and adds to the wealth of the country, and should, therefore, be encouraged. But the immediate effect is a great loss of revenue to the Government. Every kilogram of imported tobacco pays the heavy charge of PT. 43. The cultivator of tobacco pays no tithe, and a special tax of only £E2 per dunam is imposed. If the yield is taken at 45 kilos per dunam, this tax amounts to only PT. 4 per kilo. If the yield were 60 kilos, the tax would be PT. 3.3. So that whenever local tobacco is substituted for imported, the Government loses nine-tenths, or more, of the revenue it previously received. Smuggling, especially of tobacco, is a further cause of loss of income to the Treasury. Very vigorous measures have been taken against it, especially during the last few months, and it is believed to have largely diminished.

Economies.

Many economies have been effected in almost all of the Departments of the Government in order to prevent this year a repetition of the deficit of last. Among others, the number of British officials employed has been greatly diminished. The High Commissioner announced, in his inaugural speech, that this policy was intended. As the heavy labour of initiating a new and better system of administration in all the Departments of State has been gradually completed, and as Palestinian officials have been trained to the efficient performance of their duties, it has been possible to dispense with the services of a large proportion of the British officials. The total number employed by the Government will have been reduced from 377 in April, 1921, to 271 in April, 1924.

On the whole, the budgetary situation is not unsatisfactory. The total revenue collected by the Civil Administration since its establishment on July 1, 1920, including the estimates of the present year up to March 31, 1924, is £E6,972,000, and the total expenditure for the same period is £E6,729,000, showing a favourable balance of £E243,000. But the prospects of the future indicate that most careful economy on the part of the Government is still necessary.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS.

The following extracts are taken from the current issue of the monthly circular of the Imperial Ottoman Bank :—

Mesopotamia.

Wool.—The export of wool to Europe this year has been exceptionally large. The quantity shipped is estimated at well over 25,000 bales. This figure beats previous records, the maximum of which attained 15,000 bales. The stock of Arabi is exhausted, but it is believed that there are still some 500 bales of Awassi available for export.

Galls.—As stated previously, the stock has been very small this year, and practically no shipments have been made, as quotations in England are low.

Wheat, Barley, and Oats.—The July to November exports of wheat were 50,022, and of barley 56,126 tons; total 106,148 tons, as compared with 66,051 tons for the same period last year. The price of these grains continues to be very low, and trade is slack. The total exports of dates up to the end of November was 89,506 tons, valued at Rs. 116,26,918, as compared with 82,049 tons, value Rs. 101,03,544, for the same period last year.

Good progress is reported with flax experimental work, and excellent samples of scutched flax have recently been produced.

A consignment of 450 packets of silk eggs has been received from Europe for distribution in the coming season among cultivators. An increasing interest is being shown in silk culture by many landowners, but the erection of a commercial spinning mill for silk reeling remains a necessity.

CALCULATING MACHINES IN CONSTANTINOPLE.

The market for calculators and adding machines in Turkey has been confined to the banks and larger foreign business houses (says an American Consular report). The Government continues to make only very limited purchases. At present the use of calculating machines has not been extensive enough to warrant the installation of Arabic characters. It was suggested, by some of the dealers, that a few sample machines of this type might be demonstrated to official departments of the Government as an advertisement, if the expense of installation was not too great. A few adding machines are reported to be in use at Angora, but the Government has not yet been properly impressed with the value of the general use of calculators and adding machines. The few machines owned by the Government have Latin characters.

The calculating machines are used much more extensively at present than the simple adding machines. The consensus of opinion is that the market for calculating and adding machines will not be of much importance until the official circles become interested. One of the leading agents of an American firm estimates that his annual sales, under present conditions, will not exceed ten machines. One of the principal drawbacks is the relatively high price of a calculating machine. A rough estimate of the calculating machines in Constantinople at present places the number at about 150. Financial institutions have, on the average, only two or three machines; two in the exchange department and one in the accounting division. Calculating machines are not generally found in the ordinary commercial establishments. It is further estimated that the annual sale of calculating machines for the whole of Turkey does not exceed 25; probably 22 of which are sold to Constantinople buyers.

LONDON PRODUCE REPORT.

Coffee Lower.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)
London, Tuesday Morning.

Sugar.—Home refined has continued in fair request. Tate's cubes have come to business at 66s. 9d., at which they are 1s. lower. London granulated is also 1s. down at 63s. 1½d., while Lyle's granulated is a similar amount lower at 63s. 4½d. Foreign descriptions have been variable. White Java is 1s. down at 60s. 3d., while Czech granulated is 3d. lower at 61s. 9d. Futures have been dull. Quotations are:—May, 31s. 4½d.; August, 29s. 1½d.; November, 24s.; December, 24s.

Coffee.—A dull tone has characterised the market. Costa Rica is 16s. down at 160s., while Nairobi is 15s. lower at 125s. Santos is unchanged at 92s., but East Indian is 9s. up at 145s.

Oilseeds.—Linseed has again been variable, Indian at 20s. 1½d. is 7½d. down, while La Plata is 1½d. up at 18s. 1½d. Rapeseed has been dull, Toria at 17s. 10½d. being 6d. down, while real bold Ferozepore has shed 6d. at 16s. 9d. Cottonseed has been weak. Indian is 4½d. down at 10s. 3d.; Egyptian black is unchanged at 13s., while Sakellaridis has shed 3d. at 11s. 9d.

Seed Oils.—Linseed has weakened further and is 2s. down at 39s. Rape oil has been steady, with crude at 48s., while technical refined is unchanged at 51s. Cotton oil has been steady. Refined common edible is unchanged at 49s., Bombay crude has shed 1s. at 41s., Egyptian crude is 1s. down at 42s., technical is unchanged at 46s., deodorised is the same at 51s., while Egyptian refined is 1s. 6d. lower at 47s. 6d.

Oil Cakes.—The market has been very firm. Linseed cake is unchanged at 265s., coconut cake is the same at 205s., while cottonseed cake remains at 160s.

Dried Fruit.—Business has again been on an excellent scale. There has been no special change in regard to currants. The demand for this commodity continues good. Sultanas have again been in request and have been moving off freely. Figs have been an exceptionally firm spot; stocks are very restricted, and it is evident that prices will continue to rise. Plums have again been a good feature, and it is clear that the market for this fruit is expanding. Bosnian plums, it is interesting to note, are in particular favour. The demand for dates is on the up grade.

Oranges.—The market has been very firm. Consumption is now on a good scale, and the fruit is consequently moving off freely. Supplies of Jaffas are on the short side.

EGYPTIAN CROP OUTLOOK.

The report of the Egyptian Ministry of Agriculture dated March 1 states:—

Wheat.—Weather was rather cold early in the month, and since then it has become favourable. Slight attacks of smut and rust were reported from certain localities causing practically no damage. Growth is progressing satisfactorily, and the early crops are in ear. The crop has slightly improved since the last month.

Barley.—Slight attacks of smut were reported from Beheira and Daqahliya. Formation of ears is general and yield prospects are very slightly better than last month.

Beans.—The early pods are maturing, whereas flowering and podding are general in late-sown crops. The condition of the crop is slightly better than last month, though very slight attacks of broom-rape, bean, and rust were reported in many localities.

Bersîm.—Weather is on the whole favourable and growth is normal. The second cutting is general, while the third has started in a few early fields. Ploughing in the temporary bersîm is taking place. Attacks of "Hamul" (dodder) were reported from different localities, causing practically no damage. Flowering is general in the early-sown fields.

Flax.—Growth of the crop is normal except in some late-sown areas, as well as in fields where cultivation was not properly attended to. Some of these areas in Sharqiya, Daqahliya, and Minûfiya Provinces are reported to have been ploughed up for cotton. Weeding, manuring, and watering are taking place. Flowering is general, and capsules are forming in early-sown fields.

Onions.—Few areas are now being harvested for local consumption in the green state. The crop is maturing and is about normal.

Sugar-cane.—Harvesting is now in full swing. Normal attacks of stem-borer and mealy-bug are reported from many localities. Preparation of land for the new crop is taking place. Yield prospects are about normal.

Cotton.—Preparation of land is actively taking place. In Lower Egypt, Zagora is being sown on a larger scale than last year. A few fields have already been sown, and the cotton area is expected to be larger than last year. There is also a tendency towards early cultivation.

SUDAN PRODUCE.

The following extracts are taken from the report of the Central Economic Board of the Sudan Government dated February 23:—

Cotton.—Berber Province, January.—Pump and sagia cotton: Cotton from the Government pumping schemes and from Shendi sagias and saluka areas is coming in well, and there is every prospect of a large increase on last year's returns. Arrangements have been made by the Agricultural Department for monthly sales by auction at Port Sudan. Bouga pumping station report for December and January: 745 feddans are under cotton, which, on the whole, looks well. 1,070 kantars of 315 rottles (unginned) of cotton have been brought into store up to the end of January. Kitiab pumping station report for December and January: 636 feddans are under cotton. 753 kantars of 315 rottles were received into store during December and 682 in January. The total to the end of January was 1,724 kantars. Cotton is still yielding well. The deliveries from Gabrab are falling off slightly, but the rest are maintaining their level. Mikeilab pumping station report: The late grown cotton is looking excellent, but has not yet opened. Gendettu pumping station report: Cotton weighed into store to January 31 amounts to 2,167 kantars of 315 rottles (unginned). Of this, 1,378 kantars were despatched to Port Sudan for the first sale, and realised P.T. 789 per kantar unginned. Cotton is still full of bolls, but the cold weather has checked the opening of them, and picking is now light.

Dongola Province, January.—Ghaba pumping station report: 450 feddans are under cotton. 491 kantars of 315 rottles (unginned) were received into store up to the end of the month, which represents a yield of 1.09 kantars per feddan. The cotton is looking exceptionally well. Nuri pumping station report: Cotton is yielding well on the whole. The Government experimental American cotton planted on very poor land, and which did not look well at all, has yielded over 3½ kantars per feddan so far. Other plots in Nuri have yielded 3 kantars. Total quantity of cotton brought in to the end of the month, 1,007 kantars of 315 rottles (unginned). Gureir pumping station report: The total quantity weighed into store up to the end of the month was 273 kantars of 315 rottles (unginned). Some cotton has already yielded 2.5 kantars per feddan.

Red Sea Province, January.—The Tokar crop maintains its promise. The Khor Arbaat crop is still thriving, and pests have decreased.

Kassala Province, January.—The following is an extract from the monthly report of the Inspector of Agriculture: "The cotton has improved greatly during the last month. The re-sown cotton at Hadaliya and Makali is doing well. The cotton elsewhere is also looking very healthy on the whole."

RECORD CZECHO-SLOVAK SUGAR EXPORTS.

It is estimated that the past season's beet crop in Czecho-Slovakia will result in a yield of 1,025,000 tons of sugar, and that of this amount 675,000 tons will be available for export. From October last to the end of January the exports had already amounted to 343,598 tons. There is every reason to believe that the 1923-24 sugar season will be well above the figures of previous years, for the cultivated area of beet in 1923 had increased by 20 per cent., and the harvest has on the whole been satisfactory. The provisional estimate of the sugar production is 950,000 tons of raw sugar. This figure is not the final one. At least 350,000 tons of this production must be set aside for the home market. The remainder, amounting to 600,000 tons, will be exported. In industrial circles the total quantity already sold to other countries has been estimated at about 400,000 tons, or two-thirds of the entire production. Of this quantity, 78,599 tons were exported in the month of October, as against 18, 549 tons in October, 1922. The greater quantity of Czecho-Slovak sugar exported in October was sent to England, Switzerland, Austria, Hamburg (transit), Finland, Turkey, etc. It is believed that next year the area under beet cultivation will be still further extended. The necessary preparations are being energetically pursued. If the efforts of the Czecho-Slovak Government are crowned with success, Czecho-Slovakia will soon regain the prominent position which it occupied among sugar-producing countries before the war.

SALE OF BOSNIAN FOREST AREAS.

The Sarajevo Forest Department announces a sale by auction of two considerable Bosnian forest areas. One of these is the forest area of Sebesic-Semesnice, situated between the railway stations of Bugojno (south of Donji-Vakuf, on the Travnik-Jajce line) and Rama (on the Sarajevo-Mostar line), which is estimated to contain 2,100,000 cubic metres of fir trees and 600,000 cubic metres of other growths. The person or persons undertaking to exploit this area will be under an obligation to build a narrow-gauge line from Bugojno to Rama. Offers must reach the Department at Sarajevo not later than 10 o'clock a.m. on May 2.

It is announced that the British Consular Agencies at Burujird, Kasvin, Kasr-i-Shirin, and Zenjan have now ceased to exist.

THE TOBACCO TRADE OF GREECE.

Little has been done, owing to disrupted social conditions among the present population, in the tobacco territory toward the grading of Greek tobacco, but instead it has been marketed immediately after harvesting (says the American Vice-Consul at Salonika, Mr. Adam Beaumont, in a recent report). The lack of grading, together with Government restrictions on the exportation of tobacco, has reflected unfavourably on the markets of Greece during the past year.

The Kavalla market has been inactive, and exports have been reduced to a minimum, principally because of the 20 per cent. tax on foreign exchange brought into the Greek market for tobacco sold in foreign countries. The present tax on tobacco is 60 drachmæ on each oke (2,864 lb.), valued at 100 drachmæ. Tobacco merchants predict that if this tax continues there will be a crisis exaggerated by over-production of the 1923 crop, and it is believed that buyers will turn to Bulgaria for tobacco, where the crop is estimated to be twice the normal crop.

Production in Macedonia.

The following statement shows the tobacco production of Macedonia for 1923 (in lb.) :—Oriental Macedonia, 37,759,400; Basma, 27,382,200; Bashi-Baghli, 6,993,600; Cabac-Koulak, 3,384,000; Thrace, Xanthi region, 8,335,836; Central and Occidental Macedonia, 9,870,000; Basmades, 4,230,000; Bassi-Bagli, 5,640,000.

The 1923 tobacco crop of the district of Sari-Shaban is inferior in quality to that of 1922 on account of unfavourable weather and rumours that the Government intended to requisition 50 per cent. of the yield. In other districts of this region, as in Serres, conditions were normal, and as more labour was employed, the 1923 yield was larger than that of 1922. In the region of Xanthi the peasants planted more in the valleys than on the mountain sides, as has been customary in the past, with the hope of having a larger yield per acre. The result was tobacco of inferior quality. The yield per acre in the region of Xanthi was approximately 50 per cent. less than the yield per acre of the Serres region, but the quality was much better. The peasants of the Serres territory have received a greater return than those of the Xanthi region as a whole. In general, the 1923 yield was larger than that of 1922, but the quality is inferior; consequently less tobacco will be suitable for American tobacco interests.

Exports.

Total exports of tobacco from Kavalla during the first six months of 1923 amounted to 6,769,265 lb., as compared with exports of 15,314,177 lb. during the first six months of 1922, and 17,492,277 lb. during the second six months of that year. Total exports from Salonika during the first six months of 1923 were 3,842,168 lb., while exports during a similar period of 1922 were 3,710,097 lb., and during the second six months of that year were only 2,646,839 lb.

The United States was the leading buyer of Greek tobaccos in 1922, taking approximately 16,000,000 lb. of the 38,000,000 shipped out of the country. The bulk of this was exported from Kavalla, where the leading American tobacco interests have their headquarters. Germany was the second buyer of importance, purchasing approximately 12,000,000 lb. Italy, the Netherlands, and Austria follow in order of importance as buyers of tobacco. During the first six months of 1923 Italy was the chief purchaser of tobacco, taking 2,895,212 lb., as compared with 4,669,833 lb. for the same period in 1922. Tobacco for Italy is shipped through Salonika, because more vessels touching Italian ports are available. The United States follows Italy with purchases amounting to 2,327,354 lb., or 20 per cent. of the total. This amount, compared with the quantity exported during the same period of 1922, would indicate a considerable falling off in buying. However, this is explained by the fact that exports for the same period in 1922 were unusually great, owing to political disturbances and shipment as a measure of precaution against accumulated stocks of unmanipulated tobacco from the districts of Xanthi and Kavalla. On the whole, exports during the first six months of 1923 were 50 per cent. less than the same period of 1922.

COMMERCIAL BREVITIES.

The Anglo-Egyptian oil output for the week ended March 7 was:—Gemsah, nil (last week nil). Hurghada, 3,115 tons (last week 3,239 tons).

The progress reports of the Phœnix Oil and Transport Co., Ltd., and allied companies, for February, show that the total crude oil production for the month was 7,205 tons and the throughput of the refineries 6,100 tons.

The profit of the Constantinople Land and Building Company for 1923 was £3,281, plus £1,341 brought forward, making £4,622. The directors recommend a dividend of 3 per cent., less tax, leaving £2,700 to be carried forward. The directors point out that the dividend paid in December, 1923, was in respect of nine years, and the dividend now proposed is slightly higher than the average for the preceding period. Meeting, 1, Walbrook, E.C., March 24, noon.

Sir Frederic Wise having asked the President of the Board of Trade what percentage of imported petrol comes from the Anglo-Persian oilfield, Mr. Alexander has made the following written reply:—"During the year ending December 31, 1923, 5.4 per cent. of the imports of petroleum spirit into this country were imported direct from Persia. In addition, 320,433,790 gallons of crude oil were imported from Persia to be refined in this country."

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Erratic.

The Alexandria Commercial Company, in their report for the week ended March 7, state :—

Since our last report the futures market has been very erratic; at the close a much steadier tone has been in evidence. The week started with rather weak sessions, due mainly to speculative sales induced by the continued drop in New York and the absence of fresh business with spinners; towards the middle of the week the tone in New York improved, the demand from abroad became more active and the spot market showed great strength; as a matter of fact, the lower prices dropped the less cotton was offered for sale; all this caused speculators' confidence in lower prices to be shaken, and it is their attempt to buy back their sales that is mainly responsible for the sharp recovery in prices at to-day's session. Although we admit that the statistical position of Egyptian cotton is stronger than that of American and also that the spinners using Egyptian cotton are at present doing a more profitable business than those using American; nevertheless, with to-day's sharp rise further widening the difference between New York and Alexandria prices, the latter now look somewhat dear in comparison to the former. May in New York closed yesterday at 28c.99 against 30c. a week ago, whereas in Alexandria May (Sakel) closed to-day at $40.60 and April (Ashmouni) at $38.10 against last week $39.75 and $37.30 respectively; the dollar exchange in London is practically unchanged from last week. Another feature worth mentioning is that whereas the tendency in New York has of late been in favour of a narrowing of the discount of new crop options compared to the near positions, the reverse has been the case in Alexandria. Naturally, the smaller the difference between old and new crop options, the sounder the position becomes. At the March 1 tender 5,000 krs. dockets were issued. The cotton tendered has all been received by one exporter, who, it is said, is still a buyer of large quantities of March; should this report be true, the premium of March over May may be maintained if not increased owing to the high premium over March asked on the spot market for cotton round fully good fair. The week's receipts amount to 70,500 krs., against exports 82,011 krs.; the stock stands at 1,678,143 krs.

Spot.—The spot market has not shown much activity during the week, total sales amounting to about 8.300 B/s, of which we estimate 4.900 B/s Sakel, 3.400 B/s Uppers. No business has been transacted in other varieties.

Sakellarides.—Business has been done in all grades, with a preference for cotton above fully good fair. Sellers are not anxious to part with their merchandise, especially the better grades; premiums paid for the latter remain much the same as last week. A small amount of low cotton, middling, and middling fair has changed hands at fairly reasonable prices.
